Striking a Light.

In the days before the invention of friction matches the difficulty of procuring fire was so great that all pains were taken to prevent the fire on the hearth from going out. All winter long it was kept by covering the coal and brands with ashes at night. This was one of the domestic cares of our forefathers, and Homer alludes to the practice as common in his day, 3,000 years ago.

But fire could not be kept with comfort in the summer, and there would be times in the winter when the hearth would become cold. Then some coals must be brought from a neighbor's, or a new fire must be kindled in the house.

This latter process was usually accomplished by means of flint and steel. Most readers have no doubt seen a spark of fire struck out from a horse's shoe hitting a stone in the road, or from the shoes of a sleigh runner grinding over rocks.

To obtain fire by this method a piece of steel, such as a file or rasp, was struck with a flint, or a bit of white quartz from a granite ledge, and the spark was caught in tinder—charred cotton rags. The old flint lock musket, with a few grains of powder and some tinder in the pan, was looked upon by our grandmothers as a domestic utensil. Sometimes, on a clear day, a burning glass—a lens for collecting at one point the rays of the sun—was used.

The method of producing fire by rubbing together two dry sticks is known to most boys, but it has not been often adopted by civilized people. It belongs to the ruder conditions of life.

Thibet Capt. William Gill found practiced a more scientific method than any of these. The natives strike a light by compressed air. The apparatus used consists of a wooden cylinder, two and a half inches long by three-quarters of an inch diameter. This is closed at one end, the base being about the size of a quill pen; an air tight piston fits into this with a large, flat knob at the top. The other end of the piston is slightly hollowed out and a very small piece of tinder is placed in the cup thus formed.

To use this the cylinder is held in one hand, the piston inserted and pushed about half way down. A very sharp blow is then given with the palm of the hand on the top of the knob. The hand must at the same time close on the knob and instantly withdraw the piston, when the tinder will be found alight. It requires skill to use the apparatus as well as science to invent it.—Youth's Companion.

An Improved Fire Escape.

A portable fire escape, constructed with three systems of lazy tongs connected together and arranged to be elevated and lowered by a screw mounted in the platform of a truck, has been patented by Mr. Louis P. Santy, of Clements, Kan. The platform on which the tongs are mounted has screws at its corners, whereby the escape may be held upright or tipped against the walls of a building. The tongs are united by a series of triangles, a set of lazy tongs being arranged at each corner of the triangle, each set bracing the others. A screw for elevating the system is mounted in the center of the platform, a triangular plate being attached at its corners to the lowermost set of lazy tongs, and having at its center an internally screw threaded boss in which the screw works, being operated by beveled gears and crank shafts extending to the ends of the truck. By turning the cranks the three sets of lazy tongs will be rapidly elevated and by reversing the motion as rapidly lowered. At the top of the lazy tongs is a platform or cage on which persons may step from the window of a building, and be lowered to the ground by turning the cranks; or they may descend by a rope ladder suspended from an aperture in the center of the cage.—Scientific American.

A Waistcoat with a History.

Baron Minaldi, the tonsorial hospodar of the Astor house, created something of a sensation by appearing at his place of business the other day decked out in a camel's hair waistcoat of startling and unique pattern. This garment was sent to Baron Minaldi from Sicily some fifteen years ago. It was worn by one of his ancestors, the fourth Baron Giuseppe Minaldi, of Palermo, and was constructed more than eighty years ago. The fabric came originally from Kashgar, in Central Asia, and it is in as good state today as it was the day it was stitched together by a bronzed tailor under the shadow of Mount Etna. At his family dinner, over which Baron M. presided in the evening, the waistcoat was braced with one pound of chicken fricasseed, two pounds of turkey and roast pig and three pounds of macaroni. Not a button gave way. They could sew in Sicily in the early part of this century.—New York World.

To Use the Rhea Plant.

A Belfast machinist has discovered a process by which the fibers of the plant rhea can be readily separated from their woody and gummy covering, thus producing a fiber at a low price which will admit of being used for the manufacture of rope, cordage and woven goods. Rhea is a plant grown very widely in southern and eastern Asia, and one capable of cultivation in the temperate parts of Europe and America. It is the strongest vegetable fiber that has yet been discovered, and is, besides, the smoothest and most lustrous.—Cincinnati Commercial.

Telephone Whisperings.

The following is said to be a simple method by which telephoning can be carried on in a whisper: Take a sheet of thick manilla brown paper, fold and paste it into the form of a cone or funnel, some fifteen inches in length, the small end being just the size to fit into the transmitter orifice, without coming in contact with the diaphragm, and the large end being about six inches in diameter. With this mesgerum be sent in a whisper.—New York Tribune.
