BLANCHE BATES SPEAKS.

"I believe in giving something on the stage that is vital," says Blanche Bates; "something that is real; something that is human. You must respect this form of drama because it is vital, and away down in our hearts we love anything that is vital. There is a good bit of the savage left in us yet. There is a good bit of love for the primal emotions and for the crude sensations. Even the American, who is the most unsentimental person in the world, loves vitality and the simple expression of the sentiments.

"I even enjoy using profane and uncouth language. In fact, when I say 'hell' and 'damn' I do not feel in the least self-shocked. I just revel in 'hell.' I know that the surroundings in which these words are used rob them of their vulgarity and impropriety. Location and association made all the difference in the world with the language that is used. What would be quite propriety in a western mining camp would be decidedly wrong in a drawing room, but then we must remember, or rather the actors must remember, that the western mining camp is not the drawing room.

"In my new play I am allowed to recognize the fact that I have legs. I can even speak of them. I can even use them naturally and comfortably. I can sit on a table and swing them, and wear white stockings, and be indifferent as to whether or not they show. Oh, I tell you, I enjoy it all and love it.

"For all that I think that this girl who ran a saloon in this mining camp could be, and is, just as pure and lovable a girl as any in Chicago, New York or any other large city. She can protect her womanhood there quite as well as anywhere else.

"It is my idea, also, that any woman who stands alone in the world, and who must protect her womanhood herself, finds it harder to do it in the large cities than she would on the plains. Look at all these wonderful gilded palaces to lure the girl from the straight way. Look at the snares that are held out to the chorus girls, for instance. It all comes down to this, which is still another point, and which is that those men who are living nearest to nature are the men whose love is purest in their hearts."

Mike—"Pat, there's only wan thing will cure th' malaria—that's whiskey an' quinine." Pat (anxiously)—"Where kin ye git it?" Mike—"Th' whiskey an' quinine?" Pat—"No; the malaria."—Judge.

"What was your name before you were married?" asked the Chicago census-taker.

"Which time?" queried the lady.—Detroit Free
