Evening State Journal.

FRIDAY EVENING, APRIL 12, 1872.

Speech of Hon. Wm. D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, in the House of Representatives, March 16th, 1872, in Answer to the Free Trade Argument of Mr. Kerr.

The House having met for debate as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union Mr. Kelley said:

Mr. Speaker—I meet the gentleman, sir, at the very threshold of his argument.—His fundamental proposition is that the government has no right to impose a duty on goods imported into the country except for the purpose of revenue. This I deny, and say that it is the duty of the government of the United States to maintain the autonomy, the life of the nation, and the spirit and principle of that life; to maintain that system of government which, according equal rights to all, exacts equal and intelligent duties from all. This, sir, involves the maintenance of the laborers of the country of family and home, and that, at a cost of so small a portion of their earnings that they shall also be able to send their children to the public schools thrown wide open throughout the country, and possibly to the free colleges endowed by the states or by private munificence. To the existence of a government resting upon the virtue and intelligence of the people this is essential. It is no boon to the laborer. It is the duty of the government to protect the laborers of the country in the receipt of such wages as will enable them to do this, as the only means of keeping firm and unshaken the foundation upon which our Republican institutions rest—intelligent popular opinion. Nothing is more apparent to me than that the government and people of this country may defend their rights and institutions by peaceable measures, as well as by those implied by the maintenance of a standing army and a navy.

The speech of the gentleman as it goes broadcast through the country will cause many a shudder and many a sigh in the homes of our working people. It adjudges the standard of their wages to be those given in other lands. It holds up England, France and Belgium as the exemplars we should follow. Sir, there are in this country more than a million toiling farmers, artisans and laborers who have fled from the blessings of Belgium, the Zollverein, and Great Britain; and they know that a system of customs duties equivalent to the difference between American wages and those paid in the lands from which they fled is the barrier that defends their homes and families, and their ability to send their children to school for the education required to qualify American citizens for the intelligent performance of their civic duties.

Belgium! says the gentleman. Sir, the gentleman's kind heart should have corrected his head there. In the coal mines of Indiana, women and children do not work. In the iron furnaces now rising rapidly throughout the whole Southern region of the gentleman's state, there are no budding girls at work, no matrons leaving their young children at home while they toil as forgeman, or do the drudgery of the furnace. How is it in Belgium? The coal of Belgium is largely mined by women and girls. The unskilled drudgery of the iron furnace is done by women and girls in that country. In the glass factory the men retain the light work of blowing and moulding, while the women and girls do the rough labor of hauling the coal and other materials and removing the heated refuse of the works. Is that an example to commend to the working people of the iron region of either Indiana or Pennsylvania?—No, sir; it is not an example which American statesmanship should follow or propose.

Great Britain! The gentleman closed in a blaze of glorification to Great Britain. He told us that in 1842, under protection, pauperism had reached the enormous figure of four hundred and seven thousand. Why, sir, there are nearly half a million people fleeing from the British islands annually to escape the "blessings of free trade," and a large share of them come to place themselves under the oppressive "curse of protection" in the United States; and under free trade the number of paupers has swollen to more than twelve hundred thousand, as ascertained by the number found in the unions on a holiday, the first day of the year, which process showed as the gentleman has said, less than one-third of that number in 1842, but thirty years ago. This, however, is not the real number who reach pauperism during the year; for the census of the work-house is taken on the 1st of January, a holiday, and the number of paupers found on that day is what is given to the world.

Free trade a blessing to the people of England! Why, all her philanthropists deplore the fact that the small holding of land is disappearing, that the small workshop which might have grown to be a factory, is being absorbed by the monopolizing capitalist. The laborers flee from the blessings free trade confers upon them in England, that they may not go down in drunkenness and destitution to unhonored graves, leaving no mourner to drop a tear over their remains when released from the miseries inflicted upon them by the governing classes, who look only to the interests of the consumer, and take the very life-blood from the operative in every department of productive industry.

Let us look at the facts. Where does England get her door-frames, her doors, her window-frames, and her window-sashes? Go look at St. Thomas's Hospital, the last noble building erected by private munificence and government aid in the city of London, and inquire where each door and door-frame, each window-frame and sash came from, and you will learn that they came ready-made from Norway.

On the 4th of July last my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] wrote me from London. His letter was brief, and I can recall most of it. Among other things he said that having become somewhat familiarly acquainted with an intelligent workingman, a leader of his class, he had asked him how the experiment of free trade was working. "Fatally for us," was the reply, as reported by Mr. Hoar; "we begin to see how terrible a mistake it was for the working classes. Sir, in Pimlico alone I knew about eight hundred men who had made decent livings by cutting lath; but now all our laths are imported ready-cut from Norway, and most of those men are either on the poor rates or are earning a precarious living by doing jobs. The few who were able to have emigrated."—He then pointed to St. Thomas' hospital, and mentioned the facts to which I have referred, and added: "Sir, but for the fact that the bricklayers' union would not permit men to lay foreign bricks in London, the very bricks of that building would have been brought from Belgium, where they had been contracted for." Has free trade blessed the working people thus deprived of their only estate, the ability to work at the trade they had learned by long apprenticeship?

But let us proceed. Where does England go for her knit goods—she whom the gentleman from Indiana says free trade has made foremost of nations and the mistress of the sea? Sir, England was foremost among the nations and mistress of the sea as a good while before 1842, when the abstract theories of speculative philosophers vanquished the experience of ages, and abandoning the protective principle she adopted free trade. She has more manufacturing competition now, and more competition for supremacy upon the sea than she has experienced at any time since, Sir George Downing gave old Noll Cromwell the navigation laws, which prohibited the importation into England or her colonies any production of any portion of her widely extended empire in any other than an English bottom. When that law went into effect the cross of St. George supplanted the broom of Van Tromp, and Holland ceased to be the mistress of the seas. From that time England reigned mistress of the sea till during the existence of our tariff of 1842, and for a few years after its repeal we were competing with her. And now France, protective France, and Germany, protective Germany, are competing with her, as we soon shall be if free trade does not prevail and destroy our ship-yards and our ability to produce at convenient points American iron with which to build ships.

But I have digressed. Let me answer my question. She goes to Sweden for her knit goods. That charlatan who aspires to the title of friend of the working people, Mr. Mundella, the member of Parliament who recently came over here to pursuade us in adopting free trade, is a leading manufacturer of knit goods. Does he pay his constituents even liberal English wages for producing his goods? No, sir; but while the English operatives starve around him, he goes to Saxony, where wages are lower, to get his work done.

Hard as this is upon the oppressed and suffering laborers of Great Britain, it is very well for us, and will continue to be so as long as we shall defend and protect the higher wages of our operatives by an adequate tariff. Such of her working people as are thus thrown out of employment as have not been reduced to a condition of poverty that precludes the possibility of their emigrating, come to our country to earn good wages guaranteed by a protective tariff, and to enjoy home and family and a free church as well as free schools for their children.

Where are the three hundred and more copper mines in Cornwall and Devonshire alone, which in 1866 employed seven thousand men in mining? The late Sir Roderick Murchison is my authority for saying that the importation, duty free, of the cheap surface ores of Chili and Peru closed more than three hundred drifts and turned adrift more than seven thousand skilled miners. Do you think those men, bred to copper-mining from early boyhood in the beautiful counties of Cornwall and Devon, with their families about them, living humbly, it is true, but living by their labor, hailed free trade as a blessing when they turned from their homes and they and their girls and boys huddled with the pauper herd in the work-house?
