TUESDAY MORNING...OCTOBER 2, 1860.

The Bourbon Dynasty in Naples.

The dynasty of Spanish Bourbons, which is now being expelled so ignominiously from what was absurdly styled by diplomacy the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, has afflicted the southern parts of Italy and the island of Sicily for more than a hundred years. It was in 1735 that the child of Philip, first French King of Spain, (Louis XIV.'s grandson,) and of Elizabeth Farnese, his Queen, took, by force of arms, the Kingdom of Naples from the Hapsburg Emperor of Germany, and, in like manner, appropriated that insular Kingdom of Sicily, which the treaty of Utrecht had bestowed on the House of Savoy. But the reign of the first Bourbon sovereign, at Naples and Palermo, guided by the enlightened counsel of his Minister, the Florentine Tanucci, was beneficent and popular, compared with the previous dominion of the House of Hapsburg.—And it is not until 1759 that this century of miserable tyranny begins, which 1860, by a just, and though long delayed retribution, brings to an end.

In that year, 1759, Carlo, of the Two Sicilies, by the decease of his royal brother at Madrid, became King Carlos of Spain, and being thus obliged to vacate the Italian throne, he left it to his younger son. This was Ferdinand, then a child of seven, but who afterwards grew to be the coarse, insensible blackguard to whose service the British navy and its hero, Nelson, were so unworthily devoted. This first King Ferdinand, with his consort, the Austrian Caroline, "unsexed and filled with direst cruelty" as she was, was twice cast out of Naples, and protected in Sicily by her own fleet and troops. He was twice enabled, by the forces of his allies, to recover his peninsular dominions. Horribly was that restoration of the Bourbon monarchy abused, both in 1799 and in its latter lease of power, especially when confirmed by the Austrian armed intervention of 1821. The murder by a court-martial of Admiral Caracciolo, in the guilt of which, Nelson, seduced by the Queen's minion, Emma Hamilton, was said to have a secondary part, cannot easily be forgotten.

The savage Ferdinand I. was followed in 1825 by his son, the hypocrite and profligate Francis I.; and he, in 1830, by the late Ferdinand II., whom we remember but too well, and who was succeeded last year by the present Francis, last King of the Two Sicilies. So that four bad sovereigns, in direct descent, with an ominous alteration of names of Ferdinand and Francis, have inflicted on the fair Italian provinces they owned, a dreadful course of maltreatment and unmitigated misery. In Ferdinand II., of hateful memory, we have beheld the type of pure and absolute tyranny—that wilful, perverse exhibition of the capacity of doing wrong, in defiance of all dictates of equity or humanity, which has been emblematized by Mr. Gladstone as "he negation of God upon earth." Such a tyrant is simply the moral impersonation of the Spirit of Evil—he reigns Diabolo gratia.

Of the young Prince, who has just shown his peoples back to Garibaldi, it would be unfair to pronounce so harsh a judgment. He is not a royal Satan; he has not yet had time to be a tyrant; probably the effect of his court education has been merely to make him a fool. The gross ignorance and brutishness of Ferdinand I., his great-grandfather, were ascribed to the crafty design of the regents or tutors of his infancy, who had hoped to take advantage of the King's future incapacity to govern. And it is at least a very plausible conjecture that Francis II. is indebted for his defective mental development to the solicitude of his step-mother, now Queen Dowager, (a second Austrian Caroline,) whose restless intrigues to procure the crown for her own son, the Count of Trapani, were already notorious in her husband's lifetime.—Daily News.
