THE LAST BIG FINISH

It was like the gathering of the Old guard to observe the familiar figures in the Sporting World of yesteryear hovering about the bier of the late George Rose, bookmaker and one-time capitalist, on Monday, as the beautiful funeral service of the Episcopal church was rendered over the remains of the once noted and powerful Turfite, in the chapel of the Halstead company on Sutter street. An hour after the service, the sorrowing widow, Mrs. Frances Rose, and all that was earthly of the celebrity of a day or so ago, were speeding over the rails to Brooklyn, where the interment will be at Greenwood cemetery. George Rose died of Bright's disease on last Saturday. Now that he and "Lucky" Baldwin are gone, there remains but one other of the Big Three which set up opposition to Thomas H. Williams by starting the racing course at Arcadia, near Los Angeles, six years ago. The surviving insurgent is J. L. Holland of New York.

In the chapel as the Mozart quartette sweetly wafted the old English hymn, "Good Night Brave Stars"—the hardened lines upon the faces of many storm-worn sporting man relaxed into the gentle sob and quiet murmur of the truly affectionate despair in the loss of a friend.

Over in a corner of a back pew, I observed William A. Pinkerton, while Louis Metzger, the blind capitalist, accompanied by "Jerry" Driscoll, sat close to Will Humphrey of the Olympic club. James H. Scanlon represented the New California Jockey club. "Irish Tom" McGuire and Homer Curran came from the theatrical life of the town, while "Dick" Dwyer, the former starter, was there too. Henry Lerman, the attorney, "Charlie" Henderson, Rose's old cashier, Henry Swarts, and "Charley" Ascher, Frank J. Corr, and Henry Ascher also paid their respects. Mr. and Mrs. "Johnnie" Gullideau, I noticed too. And so the story of life goes. In his day, Rose handled millions of dollars in wagers, and in his operations men were broken and men were made rich, too, beyond their fondest dreams in a few weeks, but after the race of life, the story petered out to a handful of sorrowing friends and tomorrow, the busy sporting world will have almost forgotten.
