WHISKEY SAVED HIS LIFE.

A Friendly Flask Enables an Invalid to Cross Marshall Pass.

Frank Upshaw, of Denver, was discussing the merits of whiskey as an antidote to snake poisoning with a friend yesterday in a downtown hotel, says the St. Louis Republic.

One believed it to be the most powerful antidote. His friend was inclined to doubt. "I'll tell you what," said Frank, "good whiskey is an antidote not only for the bite of a serpent, but for many other ills. I am certain that I prolonged the life of a man who would have died had it not been for my little 'pocket companion.' Myself and a friend were in Ogden, Utah, waiting for the train.

"A miserable-looking man, apparently in the last stages of consumption, tottered into the gents' waiting-room. His clothes, once fine, were now threadbare and glossy. His plug hat had been brushed until what fur remained looked like stubble after the harvest had been gathered. Stepping inside, I listened to his conversation with they ticket agent, with whom he was trying to exchange his ticket for one by another route that would not compel him to cross the mountains at Marshall Pass. The rarity of the air at such an elevation was such that even those with strong lungs felt distress, and he argued that it would kill him sure, and he 'wanted to see Sallie and the babies' before he died.

"Being almost out of money, he was unable to buy a ticket, and as he could make no exchange with the agent he put on a determined look and said: 'I'll try it, anyway.' I made up my mind to try an experiment with this man if he would allow it, and if an altitude of 11,000 feet could be overcome by stimulation he should have it.

"Beginning a conversation with him, I told him that if he would place himself under my care I would insure him a safe passage over the Rockies.

"'I shall never live to cross them,' he said; 'why, it is nearly two miles above level.' My friend and myself encouraged him all we could.

"The train came in on time, and the journey was pleasantly accomplished until we had come into view of the mountains, when he grew excited and labored for breath. I produced my flask and had him partake freely, while my friend and myself kept up a flow of small talk.

"The effects of the liquor began to appear, and I gave him more, which put him to sleep. He breathed with the stertorious snore of a drunken man, but rested easily, and we were well on the down grade before he gave signs of awakening.

"'Are we almost there?' said he. 'I don't think I can possibly survive it.' Again he went to sleep, and as the engine whistled for Salida we aroused the old man from his nap, and when the train stopped helped him to the platform.

"His thanks were profuse as I bade him goodby, and every time I look at my little flask it reminds me of the man whom I carried safely over the pass, and he may now be with 'Sallie and the babies.'"

EARLY HONORS TO THE BARBER.

The Ancient Romans Erected a Monument to Their First Shaver.

Of all the symbolic signs none is so ancient as the barber's pole, and few have been the causes so much antiquarian research. According to the Athenian oracle, says the St. Louis Republic, the ancient Romans were so benefited by the work of the first barber that came to their city that they erected a statue to his memory.

Anciently barbers acted in the dual capacity of surgeons and hairdressers. In Rome they hung out basins at the end of poles, so that wounded soldiers and gladiators might observe them at a distance and know exactly where to go to find relief.

"The parti-colored pole or staff is said to indicate that the barber did 'bleeding,' the colored stripes symbolizing the strings of ribbons that were wound around the patient's arm while he was being phlebotomized.

"Two hundred years ago English law compelled barbers to display a blood pot on a striped pole, the whole to be surmounted with a symbolical cloth of red material."

An Old Truth Restated.

(From Life.)

She—I believe you don't care for me as much as you say you do. With you, I think, it is "out of sight, out of mind."

He (gravely)—You are right; for when you are out of my sight I am out of my mind.

In Good Hands.

(From Judge.)

Consumptive (in Colorado)—So you make a specialty of caring for invalids?

Landlady—Yes, indeed. I let out furnished rooms, my husband is a doctor, and I have a brother here in the undertaking business.
