WHEAT RUST.—We clip from an exchange, that is noted for reliability, the following in regard to rust in wheat: "If one looks closely to the stubble in a wheat field, he will find it covered with what might, at first sight, pass for weather stains. These lies on the rust plant, remain there through the winter, and start into growth the coming spring. These brown spores germinate and produce a form of fungus on the leaves of the barberry bushes, called 'cluster-cups,' because they appear as small cups, and are arranged in clusters, usually upon the under side of the leaf. The cup on the barberry leaves are full of minute spores, which are carried by the wind to the wheat plants, where they grow and produce the orange colored streaks [rust] upon the leaves and stalks. A word as to the damage which the rust does to the grain upon which it grows, and the way in which it is done. The fine threads of the rust plant run through the substance of the leaves and stems of the wheat plant, and take up the juices in much the same way the roots of an ordinary plant run through the soil and take up its food solutions. The matter which the wheat plant has gathered from earth and air, and would have used in making good, plump grain, goes into the fungus spores, and the rust-struck plant produces only shrivelled grain, and a poor quality of straw."

THE BANK CASHIER.—Once upon a time a man became very much discouraged because his salary was not as big as a tobacco factory, so he borrowed $3,000 000 of a bank, and forgot all about paying it back. He neglected to mention to the bank people anything about the matter at the time he had negotiated with himself for the making of the loan. There came a day when it was necessary, in transaction of business, for the bank to make use of some of its alleged money, and it was then discovered that the funds had disappeared. Of course the bank folks were more or less perplexed over this state of affairs, and the cashier who, by the way, had taken the missing wealth, was questioned concerning its whereabouts. He frankly acknowledged that he had erred in making the appropriation, and was perfectly willing to pay it back, so he examined his pockets and he could only turn up $1.12. The cashier was real sorry about not being able to settle. He said he had lost the money, but that he had no intention of doing so at all, and that as soon as he found it he would bring it right back to the bank. He said he would not like to have the matter go any further—his Sunday school class might hear of it and think strange of him, and altogether it would be best, he felt, if the whole matter were hused right up.—The Fat Contributor.
