National Retribution.

From the Richmond Despatch, Dec. 24.

We do not believe the history of the world affords one solitary example of national sin which has not been followed by national retribution. The punishment of individual transgressors may be deferred to a future state, but nations have no future existence. If it could be possible to find an empire which always adhered to the maxims of justice and wisdom, you should find one whose power and prosperity would be as lasting as time. The greatest of modern nations—England—will one day add another name to the long catalogue of fallen empires. She is now in the meridian of her glory; but the bloody stains of her Indian conquests and the commercial cupidity which has made merchandise of the souls and bodies of mankind are not forgotten in the chancery of Heaven. Even if African slavery were the gigantic crime which Exeter Hall proclaims it, and even if the silly delusion of its fanatics were true that the South is now punished for the sin of slavery, what must be the punishment of that nation which introduced slavery into the South, which forced it upon our forefathers in spite of their remonstrances and which had at one time the monopoly of the slave trade of the world, which never gave it up till its interests changed its principles?

The North need not expect to escape the universal law of retribution which has visited every nation that disregarded the rights and destroyed the peace of others. For all the national sins of the United States—and young as that country was in years, it was old in iniquity—it is equally responsible, to say the least of it, with the South. In all the filibustering of the old United States her agency has been as great as that of the South. Even in regard to slavery, New England divides with Old England the honor of establishing slavery in the South; and if the South has owned the labor, the North has reaped the principal share of the profits. If the South is receiving its punishment, we cannot expect that the North will escape. At present it is having a very agreeable time, carrying on a war and feeling none of its perils at home. It cannot expect, even upon its own favorite idea that slavery is a sin which provokes the vengeance of Heaven, to escape retribution. It will one day have to drink the same bitter cup which is now pressed upon the lips of the South, aggravated by the punishment of its crimes in the present war. It is inconceivable that the Almighty should fail to visit such gigantic wickedness as the present invasion, and the inhuman and atrocious manner in which it is carried on, with His most signal displeasure. War, such war as even the persecuted South has never yet suffered; civil war, not sectional, bloody and brutal war of races at its own doors; war of those who have not against those who have, will yet rage at its own hearthstone, and convert its fairest fields into howling deserts. There are men yet living who will see the flames of the First Revolution rekindling in all their homes in the Northern States. If such a community as Fredericksburg, pure and innocent beyond comparison is reduced to such suffering, what will be the fate of the polluted Northern cities—the Sodoms and Gomorrahs of a depraved and infidel race?

The Proclamation.

This subject is thus referred to by the North British Review, always a strong advocate of the most enlightened liberalism in England. It says:

Mr. Lincoln must have designed, one would suppose—if he had any definite design at all—and expected—if he had any distinct hopes of benefit from his decree—that his proclamation would raise the black race against the white; would turn the arms of four millions of half barbarous Africans against their former masters; would, at the very least, disorganize the entire social system in the South, and put a stop to the usual processes of industry and culture, and introduce a fearful state of anarchy and chaos. He must have hoped this; he must have been prepared for much worse. At the best, he must have hoped to create confusion and paralysis; at the worst, he must have been prepared for massacre, rapine and devastation. We confess that in our eyes few crimes can be greater than that of the guilt of which he has possibly incurred, voluntarily and with his eyes open. The deed appears to us a step beyond the limits of civilized warfare. As against the slaveholders, it is something very like fighting with poisoned weapons; and as such will certainly be regarded and retaliated by the South.

Immortalized.

That little Michigan drummer boy, who crossed the Rappahannock to Fredericksburg, with the forlorn hope of Burnside's army, has immortalized himself by his bravery or "spunk" as General Burnside styles it. We cannot pick up an exchange without seeing an account of the little hero.

☞ Dean Swift was once called upon to deliver a charity sermon. Taking the pulpit, he delivered the following, and sat down: "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord." "If you like the security, down with the dust." The result was an unprecedented subscription.
