Men say the old cathedral pinnacles point to heaven. Why, so does every tree that buds, and every bird that rises as it sings. Men say their aisles are good for worship. Why, so is every mountain glen, and rough sea-shore. But this they have of distinct and indisputable glory,—that their mighty walls were never raised, and never shall be, but by men who love and aid each other in their weakness; that all their interlacing strength of vaulted stone has its foundation upon the stronger arches of manly fellowship, and all their changing grace of depressed or lifted pinnacle owes its cadence and completeness to sweeter symmetries of human soul.

Praise after Death.

Men have commonly more pleasure in the criticism that hurts than in that which is innocuous, and are more tolerant of the severity which breaks hearts and ruins fortunes, than of that which falls impotently on the grave.

And thus well says the good and deep-minded Richard Hooker: "To the wisest and best, while they live, the world is continually a froward opposite, and a censous observer of their defects and imperfections; their virtues afterwards it as much admireth. And for this cause, many times that which deserveth admiration would hardly be able to find favor, if they who propose it were not content to profess themselves therein scholars and followers of the ancient. For the world will not endure to hear that we are wiser than any have been which went before."—Book v. ch. vii. 3. He therefore who would maintain the cause of cotemporary excellence against that of elder time, must have every class of men arrayed against him. The generous, because they would not find matter of accusation against established dignities; the envious, because they like not the sound of a living man's praise; the wise, because they prefer the opinion of centuries to that of days; and the foolish, because they are incapable of forming an opinion of their own. Obloquy so universal is not likely to be risked, and few who make an effort to stem the torrent, as it is made commonly in favor of their own works, deserve the contempt which is their only reward.—Ruskin.

—Conscience is your magnetic needle. Reason is your chart. But I would rather have a crew willing to follow the indications of the needle, and giving themselves no great trouble as to the chart, than a crew that had ever so good a chart and no needle at all.

—Whenever you see anything grand and colossal, whenever anything tiny and beautiful, the laborer has been there. He has stamped it with his sign manual. He is its creator. All that nature has given its processes from the Most High. All that art has bestowed on us is the gift of the laborer. All artificial capital is the work of his hands.

—A Frenchman roasts coffee, grinds it to flour, moistens it a very little, mixes it in twice its weight of powdered sugar, and then presses it into tablets. One of these tablets can be dissolved at any time in hot or cold water, making the very perfection of coffee; and it is claimed that a pound of the berry will go much farther by this preparation.

—Chickweed is an excellent barometer. When the flowers expand fully there need be no fear of rain for several hours. Should it continue in that condition, no rain will disturb the summer day. When it half conceals its miniature flower, the day is sure to be showery, and if it entirely shuts up, or veils the white flower with its green mantle let the traveler put on his great coat.

DISMOST FORTUNES.—We have seen since the war colossal fortunes of $25,000,000, $50,000,000 and a $100,000,000 built up by individuals. We have seen great corporations enriched and invested with power. I have said Judge Rogers and repeat, that no man can by legitimate trade or legitimate speculation, amass such fortunes in the course of a brief life. The men that do it are not generally of bad repute; they are not understood to have violated the law, but it is the power misgovernment has given them.

—A story is being told of a certain naval officer not remarkable for his abundance of brains, which, if true, does not speak highly for the discipline on board that particular ship. "You're drunk, sir!" he is reported to have said to an intoxicated blue jacket fresh from unlimited absence without leave. "I know I'm drunk," returned the tar, "but I shall get over that. As for you," he went on, looking at his commanding officer's cranium pityingly, "you're a d—d fool, and you'll never get over that."
