THE RICHMOND DISPATCH.

WHOLE NUMBER, 10,379. RICHMOND, VA., SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 5, 1884. THREE CENTS PER COPY.

NUL USE FOR TO-MORRO W'S GRAND EVENT

AND THE INAUGURATION OF THEIR FIRST

OF THE SEASON,

emulating our entire purchases for the fall and winter season of forty-two different departments, and in all eclipsing the former attempts of this or any other house. The prices quoted here are the lowest that have ever appeared in this paper, and they but give a faint idea of what we have in store, the offerings representing the FINEST IMPORTED MATERIALS to HOMESPUN DOMESTICS.

NOTE THE GREAT CHANGE IN PRICES AND SEE

We would more especially call the attention to these prices of those whose habits or inclinations lead them to deal elsewhere, as we are positive that on a comparison their patronage will be bestowed on us.

WRAPS.

We have not opened our entire line of WRAPS in anticipation of the warm weather, and would advise all contemplated buyers to wait until see our assortment, as we will be in a position to offer some extraordinary bargains, having closed out several very large lots from manufacturers who wanted the cash, which we had to give them. They are now being made under our personal supervision, and among those already received are

An ALL-WOOL IMPORTED OTTOMAN CLOTH RUSSIAN CIRCULAR, handsomely trimmed with Fur, at $6—sold last season at $12.50;

CHILDREN'S WRAP DEPARTMENT

will be complete in its every detail, our immense success in it last year having proved our ability to handle it.

We have a consignment of one dozen pairs of RAW SILK DAMASSE CURTAINS, of oriental pattern, to sell at $5 per pair, their original price was $15. The above can be hung on brass, ebonized, or walnut pole, or flat cornices, as you desire, full lines of which we have on hand;

We have made strenuous efforts this season to outdo all we have ever done in the Silk line, and in the way of assortment and prices we certainly have succeeded. As to the durability of our fabrics the patrons of twenty-five successful seasons can bear testimony.
In BLACK SILKS we have made several very fortunate purchases of some of the finer makes, and offer genuine BLACK GROS-GRAIN SILKS, 19 inches wide, at 50c.;

Our one-dollar and ten cents GUINET SILK will compare favorably with any black silk, at $1.75 per yard.
In consequence of these fortunate purchases we have been compelled to reduce our entire stock. We offer the following numbers of the LYONS celebrated Gold and Red-Border brand of BLACK SILKS at the reduced prices:

DOMESTICS

are being sold by us now at less than manufacturers' prices. Having purchased our stock during the depressed season in large case lots, and the prices having since risen, explains why our prices are so much lower than others.

DOMESTICS.

FOR THE LADIES.

ALL ABOUT THE LATE FASHIONS.

A Glimpse at Some New French Costumes—Bayadere Skirts and Trained Dresses—Trimmings for Dresses.

Harper's Bazar, in its current issue, says: The presence of red and the new bronze green is a marked feature in every fresh importation of French dresses. The bright poppey-red is seen as well as that of the darkest dahlias, and these are used alone for small mantles of velvet, but are combined in dresses with bronze-green, with gray, with brown, or with blue, and also with black. For brightening up the black toilettes, which modistes say are again in great demand, young ladies wear a skirt of red cashmere, or of billiard-cloth, which may be quite plain or in stripes with black, or else laid in kilt pleats or pleated flounces, and this serves for the foundation skirt on which the deep drapery of black cashmere is arranged. The red skirt is not seen except from the sides, and there it is visible from waist to foot or else only half this length. The apron front may be a single square-cornered breadth of black cashmere, faced on three sides and hanging flat below, with some wrinkles across the hips where it is caught up to the belt. The back drapery also reaches to the foot and may have an extra half width added to a full breadth of the cashmere; this is faced also, and is pleated in the middle, caught up bouffantly on the sides, and left to hang plain and square below. The waist may be a postilion basque or a round belted waist with lapped surplice front, in which a red V-shaped plastron shows at the top. Rows of basket-woven braid, all black, are used by those who want more trimming on the basque and on the drapery. Sometimes these apron fronts are made in Greek shape, pointing toward one side, but this displays rather too much of the red skirt, which is most tasteful when only glimpses of it are seen. Plaid wools of red and green are used for overdresses with these red skirts, and the fancy for dark green or blue draperies of cloth or cashmere done in this way is seen in youthful toilettes.

BAYADERE SKIRTS.

Another design introduced for gay dresses for young women is that of having bayadere stripes around the skirt, and plain fabrics for the waist and overskirt. These stripes may be made of velvet ribbon, or of wool braid, either black, self-color, or in contrasts; and there are also dress patterns or skirts with the ground of glacé silk, and the stripes woven around of gay velvet and plush with gilt cords on the edges. This is made up very simply to show the stripes well, and is quite effective and gay with the silk of changeable bronze-green and red, while the stripes are of dark-red velvet edged with gilt threads. The overdress of plain red velvet has a short apron overskirt, and the velvet waist is made to lap from right to left, with the fronts gathered to give a full effect, while the back is a plain basque.

TRAINED DRESSES.

Trained dresses will, it is said, be more worn this season than they have been since short costumes were adopted for ceremonious visits and for day receptions. Two kinds of trains are shown on new dresses; one of these is the court train with square corners, made to look as if separate from the short skirt beneath, though it is really fastened to it on the sides, while the second is the pleated full train which forms the only back of the skirt and is caught up bouffantly on the tournure; round corners are also most seen on such trains. For court trains three breadths only are needed, and these may have the middle breadth of figured goods, usually a gold brocade, while the two outer breadths are of the plain velvet of which the corsage is made, and these breadths are not cut at the top, but are carried around the hips to form drapery, and are crossed in front. Velvet is the fabric for full-dress toilettes with trains, and will be worn by young women as well as the middle-aged. The plain velvet is used for a pointed waist, which is laced in front as high as the top of the darts, and is thence opened in V shape, and may be filled in with lace or with Chinia crape. If the neck must be closed at the throat, there is also a high standing collar, which may lap toward the left, with a curved end like a strap, and a plastron of the figured stuff used for the petticoat front is then laid on flat from the neck to high curve above the darts, under which it disappears. On the point at the back there are two or three loops set, through which the train is hooked. If the waist is of figured velvet the modiste takes great care to make the figures meet in the seams in some way that will produce a pretty and often a new effect.

BRETELLES, ETC.

Among the revivals of old fashions bretelles are seen again, and are liked now, as they give an appearance of the long slender waist which is now in favor. These are simply revers that pass up each side of the front, cross over the shoulders, and go down the back, where they taper to a point at the waist line.
Another fancy that adds to the apparent length of the waist is that of making the middle forms of the back of a different material from the side forms, and corresponding to that used for the vest. This is seen with figured gold and green brocades for the vest and back, with green velvet bretelles outlining them, and all the remainder of the basque of green velvet. For the court train of such a dress the middle breadth would be of brocade, the outside breadths of green velvet, curving at the top and forming drapery on the hips, and the flat fronts of brocade side gores, with perhaps a plain velvet breadth for the middle. These flat effects are seen on all rich fabrics, because of their richness, which would be destroyed by being wrinkled and draped. One pretty way of finishing the foot of a brocaded velvet skirt front of three flat breadths is to cut it out in six large curves instead of squares, edge these curves with a two-inch bias ruffle of plain velvet, and let them fall on a wider bias ruffle which trims the foot of the foundation skirt; this ruffle at the foot is sometimes sewed to the skirt on its lowest edge, forming a soft drooping puff.

DRESS TRIMMINGS.

Black embroidered laces with scalloped edges and embroidered net to match are the new trimmings for dresses of black silk or satin. These laces have very fine meshes, on which flowers are wrought with silk. They cost $1.50 and upward for trimming widths, while the piece-lace is about 36 a yard. Escurial laces with very thick cord around the large figures, and the thread laces, both real and in the excellent French imitations are also used, and there are still many of the effective jetted laces and nets employed for trimmings. The preference, however, in jet garniture is now given to gimps almost entirely of jet, sometimes made of fine beads strung together in lace-like patterns, while others have larger cut beads in very wide garniture of points or of palms, or perhaps there are raised disks with a velvet background studded with large jet beads. The wide palms and disks may be separated and set about on the corsage or sleeves as epaulets or as cuffs, and also on the panels. Sets of such trimmings form two panels of graduated size for the front or sides of the skirt, and there are narrower passementeries for trimming the basque. Separate drop trimmings of jet or of satin, representing berries, or pine cones, or flowers, are sold by the dozen, and sometimes a dozen dozen are required to set about at near intervals over the front of a dress skirt and its vest, or on the side of a mantle or cloak. More substantial beaded trimmings are done with fine jet beads sewed in an intricate pattern on red satin, or pearls on white, or blue on gray satin, to form perhaps a plastron or a vest, with collar and cuffs, on a black or dark-colored silk or velvet dress. This is very costly, and half a yard is enough to brighten up the darkest dress.
For trimming wool dresses the yak laces come in all colors, both quite plain and enriched by metal threads, gilt, silver, or bronze. Braids are, however, the popular trimming for wool dresses, and these are most effective in the broad galloons in which gilt and mohair braids are woven together in basket patterns; these basket patterns are in such favor that they are also seen in buttons and in belt ribbons. Hercules braid forms a foundation for embroidery in Kensington stitches of many colors for gay dresses; for still richer costumes of velvet or silk there are metal galloons that represent Oriental colorings and designs, and are stiff with the threads of gold or silver with which they are wrought. The narrow soutache braids are most often seen in made-up designs like those already mentioned, with lengthwise rows placed on velvet or cloth, and finished on the lower edge with a narrow bunchy fringe of the ravelled braid. The rich fringes shown for velvet cloaks and for small mantles are partly of jet and partly of chenille, and are very full and fluffy, though usually some rows of the sleek mouse-tail chenille are added. Wool gimps with fried or curled surfaces are also stylish trimmings for wool dresses.

GLOVES.

Tan-colored undressed kid gloves will remain in fashion both for the street and for full-dress occasions. The effort to introduce gray gloves has failed, as gray does not contrast well with many colors, while the tan shades are to be varied in the brown tans, the red tans, and the bright yellowish tans, that something can be found among them to suit any dress. The wrinkled, loose-wristed mousquetaire gloves are preferred, and are imported in many lengths, those in light shades to be worn with short sleeves often measuring a yard from the wrist to the top. Excellent gloves for wearing with street-dresses that have long, closely-fitted sleeves are buttoned smoothly over the wrists by four buttons, and are ornamented on the back by three wide rows of stitching done in self-color. All matching the gloves with the color of the dress is done away, and most ladies wear larger gloves than they did two or three years ago, as it is considered bad taste to have them too snugly fitted.

VARIETIES.

The newest buttons for dresses have a hook at the back, and eyes or loops are provided to fasten them with. These come in dark metals, old silver, bronze, or gilt, and are in many fanciful designs, each button representing a bird or flower or dragon. Large clasps for fastening the neck and the belt are shown in woods and in metals.
Laced stockings are new this season, and are liked by those who object to garters. A slit is made down the front of the stocking from the top to the knee, and this is strengthened by a facing, and laced with a smooth lacing-string. This lacing draws the stocking snugly about the limb above the knee, and prevents it from slipping down.
Point Espagnole is white silk Spanish lace in new designs of small dots or tiny leaves, with scalloped edges, instead of the large figures hitherto peculiar to all Spanish laces. This lace is used for chemisettes and dressy full plastrons to be worn outside the corsage, and is also preferred by Worth for
