Newest Frocks of Net

Net is coming back, in fact, it is back in the form of dainty afternoon and dance frocks. It is not confined to white and cream color as heretofore, but comes in all the delicate shades like rose, pink, blue, lavender and green and, of course, there is black for the older matrons. The net frocks are usually made on very simple lines and are trimmed with lace or beads, the latter are the more popular.

This frock shows one of the most charming ways of using shrimp pink net. Rows of double picoted ruching trim the skirt, sleeves and round neck. But as if that was not enough the designer put rows of beaded trimming on the skirt and blouse also. Straight simple lines mark the frock, there are no panics, drapes or peplums, merely a plain blouse and a long narrow straight skirt. The sleeves contain the only extra fullness allowed in the whole frock. A broad satin ribbon, forming the belt, ties in a large soft bow in the back. The effect is very girlish and youthful and makes an ideal frock for the spring college parties and tea dances.

PRODUCTION OF GASOLINE IN 1918 68,000,000 BARRELS

WASHINGTON, March 25.—Gasoline production in the United States in 1918 was said today by Van H. Manning, director of the bureau of mines, to have borne out the statement of a British admiral shortly after the armistice of hostilities that "we floated to victory on a sea of oil."

A little less than 58,000,000 barrels of gasoline was produced in the United States in 1916, Mr. Manning stated, while in 1917 the production was increased under the spur of war's necessity to 68,000,000 barrels.

"It was thought by many that it must be the peak of American patriotic effort," Mr. Manning declared, "but in 1918 the production of gasoline was over 85,000,000, an increase for the year of more than 17,000,000 barrels."

In 1916 there were 3,473,102 barrels of gasoline sent abroad. In 1917 the exports increased to 5,901,147 barrels and in 1918 to 24,312,759 barrels, an increase of nearly 14,000 barrels a day more than in 1916.
