VICTIM GETS BACK AT JOKER HUGHES

Brian G., of Prize Cat and Horse Show Fame, on Verge of Despair Through Unknown's Vigorous and Unique Revenge.

BOGUS SUBWAY CARDS STIR RECIPIENT'S IRE.

Rabbits, Rag Babies and Stuffed Cats, C. O. D., Part of Awful Programme—Hughes Threatens Appeal to Authorities.

Some Recent Jokes Played on Hughes.

Hundreds of postal cards signed "B. G. Hughes & Brother" were sent out inviting the recipients to report at the Subway Tavern and receive a special pass on the subway.

Special invitations were sent to all his business rivals inviting them to meet him for the purpose of organizing a paper-box trust.

A box of stuffed cats was delivered at his office by an expressman, and Hughes had to pay.

Other express packages, containing rubber dolls, rag babies, nursing bottles, live guinea pigs, rabbits and blackbirds have been sent to him within a few days.

Agents of "how-to-get-tall" schemes have called on him one after another and produced cards from him inviting them.

Hundreds of persons have called at his office seeking jobs of every possible kind and showing cards bearing his invitation.

Brian G. Hughes, the wealthy paper box manufacturer, who joked his way into fame at the expense of a gullible public, is now tasting some of his own medicine. One of the victims of the practical joker was evidently touched on the raw, for he is coming back with a shower of barbs, and the grin with which Mr. Hughes received the first prick has turned to a howl of anguish as the darts bite into his vulnerable parts.

When he left his home at No. 1284 Madison avenue to go to his office today, he encountered a score of scowling faces over the way. A group of grim-looking men were watching him from the curb, and when they saw him descend the steps they strode toward him and shoved a handful of postal cards under his nose.

Postal Cards Did It.

Before they had a chance to press their inquiries Mr. Hughes bolted for a car and boarded it. He believes that only his agility saved his life. He declares that he saw the glint of steel in hands concealed behind the backs of those who pressed about him with the postal cards. This is what the cards bore:

1123 Mulberry Street, City.

"Oct. 26, 1904.

"We have acquired quite a number of special passes for the Subway opening, and would like some of your young men to share them. If you can conveniently spare six, let them present this card at the Subway Tavern, and the head bartender will furnish the passes.

"B. G. HUGHES & BROTHER."

"Must be presented before 2.30 Thursday P. M."

Mr. Hughes did not send out these postal cards. Nor did he send out 1,000 invitations to unemployed men offering them $3 a day to lick labels for the paper boxes his factory turns out. Neither is it likely that he invited fifty colored children to come to his office to take away all the rubber dolls and molasses candy they could carry.

Victims Threaten Things.

But these invitations and others of a dozen varieties have been circulating through the mails in the last week. The ones referring to the subway passes were the last. The recipients of the postal cards began to show up at the Subway Tavern about daylight.

"Ha, ha! That's a joke of Mr. Hughes," the bartender returned to an Italian with drooping mustache and eyes like a cobra.

The man laid the card on the bar, banged his fist down upon it and hissed through his teeth, "Doan joke me!"

The Neapolitan lunch-counter man had to explain behind a barrier of cheese knives, and it cost the Subway Tavern a pint of Chianti to get rid of the postal card holder.

After that the head bartender took it seriously. A Swedish longshoreman rocked the bar back and forth in a rage when he found he had been fooled. A genial Englishman threatened to tear out the mixologist's "bleedin' heart." A German giant from a Bowery museum said things that almost cracked the "Water Wagon" sign over the soda fountain.

Even from Over in Jersey.

Then came a man from Jersey who had brought six of his wife's relatives to the city on the strength of the postal card. He talked for half an hour while his relatives-in-law imbibed at the soda fountain. They all left, headed for Mr. Hughes's paper box factory.

When Mr. Johnson, the manager of the Subway Tavern, arrived he found a branch of the "Black Hand" Society threatening fearful torture and swift, silent and terrible death to his chief mixer should the latter fail to deliver the passes. Mr. Johnson called up Mr. Hughes. The man who won a blue ribbon at the cat show with a mothballed feline he had picked up in the street replied with tears in his voice that he was not guilty.

"I've got a crowd here at the office," sobbed Mr. Hughes, "and if Dowie could only hear what they are saying about me he'd blush at the meagreness of his own vocabulary. John Alexander is a lisping Quaker maiden compared to these. I think some of them have bombs, and there's one nice old gentleman chewing a stick of dynamite and hissing 'Vendetta!' while the dynamite drips from his whiskers. Come up and see me and I'll tell you how badly I'm being stung."

Business Rivals Fooled.

Mr. Johnson called on the man who hoodwinked a society audience into applauding a car horse as it pranced about the Madison Square Garden tan-bark, finally capturing a ribbon from its aristocratic competitors. He found a thoroughly humbled and chastened practical joker.

The subway pass postal was nothing to a few others that are pinching and have pinched Mr. Hughes where it hurts. A few days ago all of his paper box manufacturing rivals in the city received letters signed with his name inviting them to confer with him on the organization of a trust. The meeting place named was an abandoned corner in the old market building on Centre street near Canal.

The busy merchants, thinking something of large importance was in the wind, repaired to the rendezvous. They waited in vain for Mr. Hughes. They stood on the corner until their noses began to turn blue from the biting wind. Then the wind took on the same hue, as they murmured what they thought of their rival in trade. Returning to their offices, they called him up on the telephone, one by one. For three hours afterward Mr. Hughes was not seen to smile.

But he became grave indeed when an expressman brought him a box of stuffed cats C. O. D. from a big uptown toy shop. When the office boy opened the box and began humming: "I have a feline for you," the ever jovial Mr. Hughes discharged the lad on the spot.

Rabbits, Rag Babies, Etc.

But his troubles were only just commencing. The express packages began to pour in by the car-load. Rubber dolls, rag babies, nursing bottles, live guinea pigs, rabbits and a cage full of blackbirds arrived in rapid succession. Every mail brought bundles of letters replying to supposed inquiries by Mr. Hughes about various patent medicines, quack devices for overcoming baldness, beard-removing fluids and scores of weight-reducing remedies.

On top of these the agents for three persons who guarantee to grow their clients a foot by new "how-to-get-tall methods" called and would not leave until a porter assisted them down the stairs. Whoever is revenging himself on the practical joker has a fertile and original mind and plenty of spare money for postage stamps.

Applicants for employment in every known profession and calling are visiting the merchant's home and office in response, they say, to letters and postal cards received from him. Several wet nurses have called in the last week; and now there is a run of sausage-makers, sauerkraut blenders, pickle-pickers, drug clerks, cloak models, corset models and bartenders. The office boys come in droves, as do the eager applicants to lick labels at $3 a day.

If the joke continues on Mr. Hughes much longer he says he will call upon the police and post-office authorities to defend him from his Nemesis.
