THE BOSTON JUBILEE.

An Estimate of the Great Crase from a Springfield Point — The Points of Success and Failure.

(From the Springfield Republican, July 1.)

The Boston "pow-pow," as some of the acidulous New York critics contemptuously call Mr. Gilmore's jubilee, closes its second week to-day with a great flourish of trumpets, five military bands participating. In spite of a bad beginning, and the expenditure of a quarter of a million of dollars up to the end of the first week, the great undertaking seems likely to pay expenses and something more. It was an interesting question at first where all the money was coming from. The chorus, in an enthusiastic spirit of self-sacrifice, and in spite of rather ungenerous treatment by the managers, spent their breath without hope of reward; but everybody else who contributed in any way to the performances had to be paid, and the bills accumulated very fast. At first the masses were conspicuously absent, but the prices of admission were lowered, and since then the attendance and the bank account has improved. Then the orchestra, a large source of expense, was cut down more than one half after the first week, and with this and other economic reductions the balance at the close is likely to be on the right side of the ledger.

But has the jubilee been a success? In special features, very decidedly. Yes. As a whole, and so far as its monster character is concerned, No. It is very grand to hear 20,000 voices sing 'Old Hundred" and the other familiar tunes which have been performed there; but this jubilee chorus had a higher aim. The book in which they were drilled for weeks and months contained many selections of special merit and some degree of difficulty. The chorus learned them, and they went to Boston expecting to sing them, but not a fifth part of them has been heard at all. Why? Because Mr. Gilmore found at the start that his chorus, although better trained than that of the first jubilee, was too large to be manageable, except in slow movements, and he has been afraid to trust it with much else. The range of the music performed has therefore been very limited; a few selections have been sung and resung, and the part of the chorus which was to be, and should be, the great feature of the festival, was made very for several days absolutely insignificant. The orchestra was also too large at the start for any finished, clean-cut performance, although it did excellent work in spite of the disadvantages of place and numbers; and the organ, a miracle of noise, was, in every musical sense, a failure. Could Mr. Gilmore reduce the ensemble of his jubilee to one fourth its present size—smaller chorus, smaller orchestra, smaller organ, and smaller concert-room—he would unquestionably make it a much greater success, so far as musical effect and artistic result are concerned. The possibilities would be infinitely greater; the actual performance could but be in a like and gratifying degree improved. The vulgar idea that 20,000 voices combined are more effective than a less number in a smaller space is happily exploded by the present jubilee, and not even Gilmore will undertake to carry through an affair of such magnitude again.

We might point out other particulars in which the grand scheme has been a failure—the piano forte solos, for instance, which were a very glaring absurdity in a room five hundred feet long. But we pass to the special excellencies of the jubilee, which have really given it all its eclat. First and most noteworthy were the foreign military bands. It was a happy thought in Gilmore to engage them, and it has been a happy experience for the patrons of the Jubilee to hear them. The critics cannot quite agree which is best, but all admit that no approach to such perfection of style and absolute finish of performance has been reached by any of our American bands. The common harshness and blare of brass is forgotten in admiration of the high musical quality of their tone, their rich blending and contrast of reeds and brass, and the symmetry and smoothness of all their performances. It is well worth one's while to go to Boston to hear such playing as theirs without regard to the rest of the Jubilee attractions.

If the Jubilee can boast only one great vocalist, it is certainly to its credit that that one is a consummate artist. Madame Parepka-Leutner has shown herself a soprano of dazzling capabilities. There is apparently nothing in the way of vocal execution that is beyond her reach; and it is not merely the twittering of a bird, but splendid, intelligent singing. To secure so fine a singer was one of Mr. Gilmore's triumphs, and to introduce to America composers so famous as Abt, the German song writer, and Strauss, the Austrian waltz-maker, was another.

There have been signal errors of management and execution, as was, of course, inevitable with an enterprise of such magnitude. Some of the programmes have been unworthy of a festival so ambitious, and all of them have been changed and rechanged, apparently by the freak of a moment; but the special triumphs which we have narrated have largely atoned, with the public at least, for these deficiencies, and have secured for the Jubilee the degree of success which it has attained.
