No. 21.

Do you advertise (God save the mark!) on the backs of restaurant bills of fare? Do you put a card in the book "for the benefit of the Fire Department?" Do you subscribe to the "Industrial Progress" book and have your picture in it as a prominent business man? Does the "Society" programme catch you? Are you susceptible to the blandishments of the gentleman who puts beautiful charts in all the railway stations?

Do you take "a space—the only one left," in a thousand and one schemes that come around every year? Do you suppose you ever got a cent's worth of benefit out of any $10 you ever spent that way?

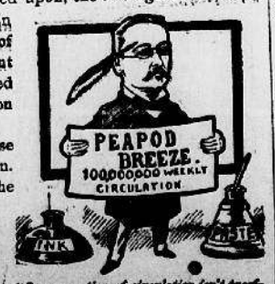
If all the dollars that are diverted from the newspapers into these and similar channels were used in buying space in the best paper in town there would be fewer merchants who say that advertising is a doubtful undertaking.

There's nothing doubtful about it. It is as sure as any other business transaction. The funny part of it is that it is generally given less attention than any other department of a business.

"Do you take a space—'the only one left'—in a thousand and one schemes that come around every year?"

The contract once made, and the space decided upon, the average advertiser's interest seems to die. Even a neglected ad in a good paper will do some good, in spite of the advertiser's apathy. A good advertisement will always bring profitable returns, if placed in a paper whose price for space is based on an honest circulation statement.

And if I were an advertiser I would not use a paper that refused to prove its circulation. Circulation is what he is buying and he has the right to know the quantity. And bare assertion isn't proof—not by several thousands, sometimes.



"Bare assertion of circulation isn't proof—not by several thousands, sometimes."

THE WEATHER MAN.

How He Knows When It Is Going to Storm or Clear.

Official Map Made Up from Reports from Observation Stations in Cities and Towns of the Country.

Strictly speaking, our weather bureau is made up of a great many buildings scattered all over the United States, and the one at Washinton is the central station that governs and directs the smaller ones, and to which they send in their daily reports; for it is by getting reports from all the different sections of the country that Uncle Sam's weather-makers are able to make their predictions. There are 180 towns and cities in the United States where there are observation stations, having the same instruments and apparatus as the Washington bureau. Now, the observers at these 180 stations do not spend their time waiting for spiders to crawl out of their holes or looking at the sky to see whether it is red or gray in the evening. They look at their thermometers, barometers, anemometers, and so on, which are far better guides than all the other signs put together.

At 8 o'clock in the morning and at 8 o'clock in the evening of every day the observer at each one of these weather stations from Maine to California looks at his different instruments, and carefully notes what each of them marks. Then he takes a look at the sky, to see whether it is fair or raining or snowing, and to see what sort of clouds may be sailing about. According to the weather bureau there are seven different kinds of clouds, and it is important that the observer should see what particular kind is hovering around, for each kind means some special kind of weather or some particular state of the atmosphere. When he has finished his observation and noted all the indications, he telegraphs his report to Washington.

In that way, then, the Washington station receives an account of the weather at all parts of the country at the same time, and, as you may easily believe, it keeps the four telegraph operators busy receiving the messages that come pouring in soon after eight o'clock. As each message is received in the telegraph room it is carried by a messenger across the hall to the forecast room, or room where predictions are made, and handed to the translator. As the translator reads aloud the cipher reports from the different stations, other men in the room mark what he reads upon a map of the United States, so that when the last message has been translated the map shows just what the weather is at each one of the 180 stations. The map is then turned over to the official who is to make the predictions. In order to get his bearings, he traces across the map the different places throughout the country where the temperature is the same and the places where the barometer is the same. The one he marks with red lines and the other with black lines, and if you will look at the weather map you will see these red and black lines wriggling and twisting all over the country.

When the reports from the northwest show a great fall in temperature, he knows that a cold wave has started on a journey through the United States, and he keeps a lookout to see how fast it reaches the different stations in the west. Then he calculates how rapidly it is moving and what kind of weather it has to encounter, and perhaps, when he has worked out the problem, he will telegraph the following bulletin: "Hoist cold wave flag; thermometer will fall 30 degrees in next 24 hours," and, sure enough, by next day Jack Frost has got hold of our noses and toes, and the cold-wave flag is almost tearing itself to pieces with delight. But sometimes the cold wave does not come as was expected—it is switched off on a sidetrack or it melts on the way—and then the cold-wave flag droops in shame.

GREEN-CORN DANCE.

An Annual Celebration of the Seneca Indians in the Hills of Their Reservation.

The annual green-corn dance of the Seneca Indians was recently held in the hills of their reservation, 25 miles east of Vinita, I. T. The Senecas number about 200 people, and they hold many different celebrations during the year, among which are the strawberry feast, supper for the dead, dance for rain, war dances and the green-corn dance.

The dance occurs every year at the drying up of the corn, and the time is fixed by the Seneca Indian council. The chief and six members of the council meet and make preparations for the green-corn dance by appointing a medicine man and a number of hunters to secure wild meat for the occasion. A hunt is made, and when the hunters return the dance takes place.

The Indians meet under their large shed or arbor and early in the morning the leader of the band or medicine man makes a speech, standing in the center of the shed, and talks in a slow and solemn voice. At intervals he puts small bits of ground leaves from a plant sacred to the Senecas on a slow-burning fire, and as the smoke and the fumes raise he makes his prayer, believing that the smoke conveys the words to the Great Spirit. After these proceedings are over dinner is ready and the meal is served by waiters under the shed. In the afternoon the dance commences in the old-fashioned Indian style and continues for several days.

A Thanksgiving Dinner.

Heavy eating is usually the first cause of indigestion. Repeated attacks inflame the mucous membranes lining the stamach, exposes the nerves of the stomach, producing a swelling after eating, heartburn, headache, sour risings ann finally catarrh of the stomach. Kodol relieves the inflammation, protects the nerves and cures the catarrh. Kodol cures indigestion, dyspepsia, all stomach troubles by cleansing and sweetening the glands of the stomache.
