PLEA FOR VINES AND SHRUBS

Undoubtedly Render Roads More Attractive and Also Tend to Keep Down the Dust.

Fortunately we have in this country examples of well-kept parkways and boulevards which border cultivated lands. Their ample parking is grown to grass and embellished with herbaceous flowers, shrubs, and trees. Yet the farm lands they border are neither overwhelmed by weeds nor devastated by insects and rodents.

The question of roadsides propagating vast numbers of noxious weeds may be viewed in more than one light. For instance, the mowing of waysides for long series of years has not done away with the need of cultivating crops; indeed it cannot, for cultivation is necessary for other reasons (as loosening, aeration and water conservation) than the destruction of weeds. Furthermore, the amount of cultivation customarily given crops is sufficient to control all the weeds the land will grow, and this number is generally present despite the razing of roadside growths. On the other hand, the lack of verdure and shade and the general dreariness of roadsides make it very desirable that a different treatment of these most extensive public parkings be adopted. Placing vines upon fences and planting numerous shrubs and shade trees along the way will not only render the roads more attractive but will tend to keep down the dust.—Exchange.

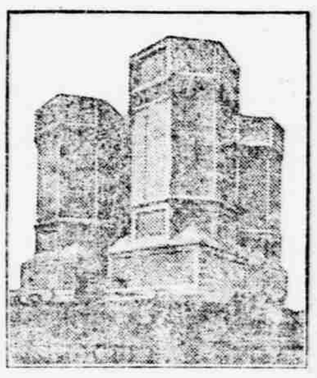
EFFECTIVE USE OF CONCRETE

Cincinnati Engineers "Camouflaged" Water Tanks That Otherwise Would Have Been Blemish.

The citizens as well as the engineers of Cincinnati, O., were troubled at the prospect of disfiguring a beautiful residential section of the city with five 100-foot water tanks, and many plans were presented for making them less unsightly. The one chosen for architectural effect was a shell of concrete which transformed the huge ugly towers into impressive monuments. The problem of form work for the construction of the shell was difficult.



Concrete Shells Which Camouflage Unsightly Tanks in Cincinnati.

First the tanks were constructed in the usual manner, of steel, and these were filled with water so that they would be the same shape. It was feared that if concrete were poured while they were empty slight changes might take place when the tanks were filled, causing the concrete to crack.

The forms for the first setting were placed on the foundation and braced to the ground. As each panel of the form weighs a ton it is readily seen that it was a difficult task to raise the huge weight.

These water towers have been designed so that they fit into the City Beautiful plan of Cincinnati. The top of the concrete structure has the appearance of the battlements of an old fort, and is really very effective.—Scientific American.

Rules for House Painting.

A widespread movement to preserve national and private property has aroused great interest in the materials which will assist in such preservation. Paint is by far the most important agency in the protection of exterior surfaces against deterioration through heat and moisture. Paint means color; and just as the degree of protection produced through paint varies according to the quality of that material itself, so the effect of colors produced with paint depends greatly upon the character of the different hues in which the various kinds of paints are manufactured. Pure or bright colors have their place, while grayed neutral colors are often necessary to assist in producing the right appearance; but the impure or dull dead colors should always be avoided in exterior painting.—People's Home Journal.

Getting Into Print.

"Of course I'm not seeking publicity, young man. I hate newspaper notoriety."

"Then, why did you grant me such a lengthy interview? I have notes enough for more than a column."

"Well—er—can't you convey the impression to the public that I consented to talk with the greatest reluctance?"—Birmingham Age-Herald.
