A South American railroad from Africa, Chile, to La Paz, Bolivia, is able to boast of equipment unique in the history of railroading. At its highest point it reaches an altitude of 14,105 feet, making it one of the highest lines in the world. The effect of the quick ascent and great altitude on people having weak or abnormal hearts is to be counteracted by having oxygen compartments in which they will have to live, as they breathe the same proportions of oxygen as at sea level.—St. Louis Star.
