PROSPECTORS OF BLACK HILLS ARE NEARLY EXTINCT

Denver, Colo.—The Black Hills prospector, that unique character who has furnished many a theme for novels built around man's quest for gold, practically has disappeared from South Dakota, B. C. Yates of Lead, S. D., declared in an address before the 23rd annual convention of the American mining congress.

Passing of the prospector has been due primarily to the fact, according to Yates, that "the gold taken from the mines does not have sufficient value to pay the cost of production." He described the gold industry in the Black Hills as being "in a state of disintegration."

"In every mining community of the hills are to be found empty houses and deserted prospectors' cabins," he said.

"The gold industry," he continued, "is face to face with a grave crisis, brought about by the World war and the shortsighted policy adopted by the government of breeding without feeding the one industry absolutely essential to the life of any civilized nation at all times."
