Broken Bones.

Nowadays a broken bone is not always put up directly into a splint and kept immovable until it has healed. Many fractures—i. e., bone breaks—have damaged or involved joints, and in the case of the elbow, wrist and ankle there would soon be an incurable stiffness if the splints were kept on until the bones were quite united again. So that, if the case be suitable, the surgeon nowadays removes the splints and, having bathed the limb, gently rubs and moves the joint for a minute or two. Union of the bone and the use of the limb are in that way hastened at the same time.
