AN AZTEC SACRIFICE.

One Horrible Scene of Many in Mexico in the Days of the Montezumas.

Fifty-two years constituted the Aztec cycle. To this cycle was added a complement of thirteen days, intended to make the solar and civil years agree. It was believed that the world would come to an end on the last night of a cycle, and that the gods, if merciful, would light their fires on the distant mountains. If the world did not come to an end the Aztecs congratulated themselves that it would survive another cycle, and the thirteen complimentary days were passed with feasts, sacrifices and bacchanals.

In the temple of Huitzilipochtli there was to be a gladiatorial combat, which was nothing less than a sacrifice. The six ministers of the ceremony were at hand. Topiltzin, the chief among them, clad in a crimson vestment, with a crown of varicolored feathers, was performing the duties that preceded a sacrifice to the god, and the others, with white robes bordered with black, their faces hideous with somber pigment and mouths painted white, assisted him. A crowd filled the stone walls of the temple to witness the spectacle, surging with impatience about the temalcatl (or round, stone platform, eight feet high) where the combat was to take place.

The victim, a prisoner of war, is brought in. Armed with only a short spear and shield, he is placed upon the temalcatl, tied by one foot and confronted by an Aztec warrior fully armed. The flat nostrils of the victim are distended, his black eyes burn with desperation; his coarse, black hair straggled about his face, and his thick, purple lips quiver as he views the well armed soldier before him.

At a word they fall to the fray. The spears clash and they fight like demons—the victim with the desperation of certain death, the soldier to uphold his valor among his comrades.

Suddenly, realizing how unequal the contest, and that his fate is sealed whatever the outcome of that battle, the prisoner throws away his shield and spear and presents his breast to the soldier's weapon. A pause, a blow, and the victim falls heavily to the stone.

In a trice the priests, with frenzied shouts and hair streaming about their demoniacal faces are upon the temalcatl, and have borne the dying man to a block of green jasper, on whose convex surface they throw him. This is the sacrificial stone, and Toplitzin, who now takes the name of the god to whom he sacrifices, opens the breast of his victim, tears out his heart and offers it, still palpitating, to the sun.

Then the bleeding trophy is placed in the hollow mouth of the idol Huitzilipochtli, and the lips of the statue daubed with blood. The dead man is decapitated and his head deposited in the Tzompatli, an ossuary where the skulls of sacrificed prisoners of war are set into the walls. The soldier claims the body for his own, and bears it away for the delectation of himself and his anthropophagical comrades.

The Aztec annals that come down to us are glutted with scenes like this.—Detroit Free Press.

There is no danger of a cold resulting in pneumonia when Chamberlain's Cough remedy is used as directed "for a severe cold." It effectually counteracts and arrests any tendency of a cold to result in pneumonia. This fact was fully proven in thousands of cases during the epidemic of influenza last winter.
