PROFITS PROOF OF PUBLIC INTEREST IN THE WORLD SERIES

Box Office Reports Show That Great Annual Championship Contest Grows in Public Favor.

SOME WORLD SERIES GAMES OF OTHER DAYS

New York, Oct. 6.—No clearer or more positive illustration of the extraordinary interest taken by the public in the annual world's championship series of baseball games can be desired than that furnished by a glance at the financial results, a statement of which is officially announced at the end of each post-season competition for the coveted title and flag. Through the box office its popularity can easily be measured. Contrared with the meagre returns at the initial series in 1884 the enormous crowds registered by the clicking turnstiles show that by leaps and bounds the attendance in recent years has assumed such gigantic proportions that there is no telling what it may amount to in years to come.

The first championship games between the Providence "Grays" and the Metropolitans may have been only lightly attended and there is nothing on record to show what the receipts amounted to for the three games then played, as Providence won three straight. The following year, however, when seven games were played in four different cities, Chicago, St. Louis, Pittsburgh and Cincinnati, the financial result was about $2,000. That year the fight was a hot one between the Chicago Nationals and the American association club of St. Louis, and one can hardly imagine what would be the yield just now if such a series were possible over a similar circuit.

Of course in those days seats in the bleachers could be had for "two bits" and the best seats in the grand stand brought the top price of half a dollar. Even at those rates there could not have been much enthusiasm judging from the results. Today, however, prices have soared so that a single admission costs a dollar, or rather that is the face value of the little card board and the holder of one of these is considered lucky if it has not cost him more than thrice that amount.

In the early days of the world's series tickets were easily obtained at the regular prices and no one had to worry as to whether he would get to his favorite seat for one or all of the games. This easy method of satisfying one's baseball appetite disappeared years ago and fabulous prices are offered for ordinary seats in the stands not to speak of the immense prices demanded for the exclusive coupons which entitle the possessor to view the games from a comfortably upholstered chair in one of the boxes, of which there are several rows in the newly built stands.

From the moment that the pennant in each of the major leagues appears to be heading for a certain club or city, the would-be spectator begins to worry as to how he is going to secure a vantage point to see one or more of the contests and the fight for tickets begins. For weeks before the end of the regular season, requests are sent for reservations, but it is safe to say that fifty per cent of these result in disappointments. Long lines form in the vicinity of the playing grounds the night before each battle and fancy prices are given to the persons who await their turn in these lines for the result of their long vigil. The big prices that are paid for tickets in this way do not increase the receipts so far as the players or clubs are concerned, as the box office returns are not influenced by the exorbitant amounts asked, in fury demanded, by the holder of the choice coupons.

In 1887 when Detroit and St. Louis played fourteen games in nearly a dozen cities the receipts amounted to $42,000, about $3,000 a game, which was then considered a large amount. The following year $24,362 was taken in for the ten games played by New York and St. Louis. The first year of the Temple Cup series, 1894, four games were played and average per game was $4,500 at Baltimore and New York. There was a falling off a year later when the Cleveland-Baltimore series of five games realized only $14,750.

In 1903 when the first series was played between the pennant-winning team of the National and American leagues, eight games brought a little over $30,000. There was no contest in 1904 but a year later there was an advance in the price of admission and $68,405 was taken in for five games at Philadelphia and New York, but the attendance fell to $91,723 as compared with over $100,000 two years previously. The attendance dropped to 62,000 in 1908 for the Chicago-Detroit series, but the receipts jumped to nearly $95,000.

A marked increase in attendance and receipts was registered in 1909 when 146,295 persons paid $188,382 to see the seven-game series between Pittsburgh and Detroit. Philadelphia and Chicago played five games in 1910, before 124,232 persons with gate receipts of $173,989 and this amount was almost doubled the following year when 179,844 persons contributed $342,164 to see the Philadelphia and New York series of six games. This was a mighty jump but it was eclipsed in 1912, the banner year for attendance and financial results. The Boston Americans and New York Nationals played eight games, one of them resulting in a tie, that year, and it was estimated that a quarter of a million spectators saw the protracted series, which drew $490,449. This enormous increase was, of course due to the extra games that were required but last year when only five games were needed to settle the questioning supremacy between the Giants and Athletics $325,983 was paid in with an attendance of 151,000. hTe average receipts per game in 1912 was $61,206, while the average last year was increased to $65,136.

Each of the winning players on the winning side in 1903, the first year that the series was played under the conditions which now prevail, received $1,316.25 and each of the losing players got $1,182. In 1912 the Boston winners received $4,022 each and the New York losers were handed $2,566 each. Last year each player of the Athletics got a winning portion of $3,246.36 and the losing share for each New York player was $2,184.22.

The basis upon which the world's series receipts are divided is as follows: The National committee receiving 10 per cent of the receipts of each and every game. The players of the two competing clubs receive 60 per cent of the remaining 90 per cent of the first four games played. The sum is divided 60 per cent to the winners and 40 per cent to the losers. The remaining 40 per cent of the 90 per cent of the first four games goes to the club owners, 90 per cent of the receipts of every game after the first four becomes the property of the stockholders of the two contesting clubs.

Details of attendance and division of the receipts each year since 1903 are appended:
