THE SELF-MADE.

BY AUGUSTUS SNODGRASS.

The strongest souls how weak—how blind!
For off with angry tongues we blame
The Fate which lifts the pressing mind
Upon the mount of Fame.

A noble parentage may charm,
And wealth may dazzle vulgar eyes;
But nothing save the toiling arm
Shall pluck the deathless prize.

A noble ancestry! To me
What is it if a thousand Kings
The fountain of my blood should be,
If it no honor brings?

We must work out our own good fame,
And build the steps o'er which we climb;
And Millions dead, can ne'er one name
Send down the waves of Time!

The mountain tree which stands alone
Whose roots by men ne'er watered were,
Upon the pigmy growth looks down,
The fruit of anxious care!

That is the self reared and the strong;
This is the man-reared and the weak;
That ages stands;—on this are long
The winds their wrath shall wreak.

The noblest heritage of all
Is honest worth—soul pure and strong!
With there fear there no lasting fall
Among the shafts of wrong.

Rise up by thine own toil and care!
How out thine own immortal crown!
The brood of Error never spare,
And Right's good arms pluck down.

Then shalt thou like a giant stand,
Unmoved amid the ages long;
Thou hast thy fortune in thy hands;—
The self-taught and the strong!

The Moon.

Messrs. Greeley and McElrath:

Permit me to trouble you with the publicity of a few remarks in answer to our Lunarian friend, who favored us with a few gratuitous remarks on the phenomena of the Moon He says:

"It is capable of easy demonstration that the Moon has no atmosphere; the matter has been proved over and over again, it has received the sanction of the most eminent astronomers, and no man who has properly examined the subject will now deny it."

Very well: perhaps not; and now if I rightly understand your position, all who do not accede to your selenographical theory, of course stand in relation to you as student to teacher. Now permit me to inquire, when was it "proved over and over again," and by whom was it "sanctioned?" Did not Schröeter contend that there existed a lunar atmosphere, but he estimated it to be only 5,742 feet high; and did not Laplace favor that opinion when he says "he considered it as being more attenuated than what is termed the vacuum in an air pump." And I also ask, does not the well known Captain William H Smith of the present egemania the sure position when in his Proiegomena page 135, while speaking of that body, there quote, Mauler and Beer, and of whom he says their "selenographical researches have been carried to unprecedented extent, arriving at the conclusion that the Moon is not without an atmosphere, but that the smallness of her mass incapacitates her from holding an extensive covering of gas;" and, says he "they add" "it is possible that this weak envelop may sometimes through local causes in some measure dim or condense itself." Moisture seems a necessary ingredient, if not one indispensably requisite, to the adhesion of matter; and if moisture does exist then how is it possible for an atmosphere, however attenuated, also to exist?

I will now pass on to examine the next clause where you say:

"It is equally well establishe that there are upon the surface of the Moon volcanoes in an active state of eruption."

Since I only base this position on the certainty, or uncertainty as may be, of the first hypothesis, and as I have clearly shown from authentic sources that the first position is unsound, and by no means "established," then by your own logic is proved that no volcanoes there exist, which is more than I have the audacity, or wish to attempt. Is this not a fair induction?

But further, say you, "the clearest proof of this is, that during eclipses of that body they have actually been seen:" such proof indeed would be very conclusive, if the case: but this point is liable to conflicting opinions, and, therefore, is not yet [though equally] "well established;" albeit there are radiations, or divergent streams of light, such as are seen at Copernicus and Tycho, emanate from the outer margin of Aristarcus, and apparently extend over hill and vale for many miles, and if so could not be flowings of lava, as has sometimes been supposed. I might adduce evidences in regard to those maculæ which have sometimes been taken for the source of lava, but I think it not necessary. You say:

"That a volcano contains within itself all the principles, of combustion, and therefore does not require an atmosphere."

For say you:

"Gunpowder affords an example: This substance is subject to the same rule, and it has been found that it burns perfectly well in the most perfect vacuum, and when we reflect that in volcanoes there is a continual combustion going on far down in the bowels of the earth where there is no oxygen, we can reconcile ourselves more easily to these apparently contradictory hypotheses."

That a volcano has its necessary constituents, I do not doubt, but to deprive it of its ingredients, it would then cease to be one: and do not oxygen and hydrogen, with other gases, render important aid to its evolutions, for, since earths are compounds of certain metallic bases and oxygen, and these earths are moist, they must contain hydrogen, and as all bituminous substances evolve certain gas according to their compounds, and as these certain bituminous substances support volcanoes, and as this bitumen could not exist without earths, and as oxygen enters into its composition as shown, and as these earths are moist as we know, and therefore contain hydrogen, it therefore by consequence, follows that without these conditions volcanoes could not exist; and if exist, why have an atmosphere. Now I do not pretend to any familiarity with your gunpowder experiments, in a perfect vacuum; but I will ask if this discovery has been made known to Artillerymen, since I believe in rapid successive firings, safety somewhat depends on excluding a circulation of air, while loading; is not this the case? But however this be, matters not, since you say "volcanoes are subject to the same rules as gunpowder;" very well; now, gunpowder is made from a combination of nitre, sulphur, and charcoal; deposits or productions of the earth, and as oxygen enters into that composition, and which earth contains water, and an extensive atmosphere, as its envelop, is it not reasonable to suppose, that the ingredients could not exist under contrary circumstances, and therefore gunpowder could not be made, and of course would not exist. It remains for you to show, first, that that satellite is without moisture, and consequently is without an atmosphere; and secondly, that volcanoes can notwithstanding exist; and in order to which, that they partake of a different nature, than what is known of volcanic phenomena as here exists. R. A. S.

SUBSOIL PLOUGHS.—In many soils, not otherwise rich enough for corn, it would be a good practice to make a furrow six inches deep in the fall, with a common plough, then let a subsoil plough run in this furrow ten or twelve inches more; and it would be still better to put corn stalks and other manure in this trench, and hated in when thoroughly wet, with a small plough or hoe; the land to remain in this state till planting time. The subsoil plough is very valuable; by forcing the soil will so long wet in great rains, and will bear great drought. Where the subsoil plough is used, in comparison with only the common plough, the yield will be fifty per cent more, and the crop in dry weather always green. The subsoil plow has doubled and frequently trebled the crops.—[Farmer and Gardener.
