THE TRIBUNE.

NAVIGATION OF THE RIVER AMAZON.—In reference to the account we published a few days since that a Capt. KLAUSE had discovered that the River Amazon was navigable by steamboats of light draught from its mouth on the Atlantic to Tingo, a point but seven or eight days' distant from Lima, in Peru, which is but eight miles from Callao, on the Pacific, the Boston Advertiser says those "seven or eight days" are occupied in the crossing of the Andes mountains. The town of Pasco, which gives its name to this passage of the mountains, is thirteen thousand feet above the sea. Of course the navigation of the river now opened is of no use as a commercial movement from sea to sea, when such a portage is involved at one end of it.

The Spanish Journal which published this account is called the "Grenada Chronicle." It cannot have been first published there, for it clearly was written in Quito, which is not in New Grenada but in the Republic of Ecuador. The expedition, too, was ended on the 23d of April last, four months before this publication of the Grenada Chronicle. Our readers will understand that Capt. KLAUSE has opened two different lines of navigation from the Atlantic, one into Peru to the Eastern side of the Andes, and one into Ecuador to the Eastern side of the same range. Ecuador is the Republic next North of Peru.

The same paper adds that the town, Jabalinega, spoken of in the account of Capt. KLAUSE'S expedition, does not appear on the best maps which we have consulted. As it seems that only one steamer was used in the navigation, it is perhaps doubtful whether more than one was on the river. After the commander had crossed the mountains, a little exaggeration would perhaps advance the interests of the Company in its applications for a contract at Ecuador. The distance traveled by land, over the Andes in Ecuador, between the last point attained by the steamer and Quito, is between one and two hundred miles.

The Amazon and its branches have been before descended by travelers from the Pacific, but this is the first account of so high steam navigation, or of a practicable and comparatively easy passage up the river from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The following extract from an article on Brazil in the Revue des Deux Mondes, by M. des Chavagnes, a French traveler in that country, gives an account of two successful expeditions of this kind. The success of Capt. KLAUSE in ascending, is none the less gratifying. We see no reason to doubt the account given of his expedition, excepting in the particular to which we have alluded.

Translated from the Revue des Deux Mondes.

Two officers of the English navy have recently (in July, 1844,) arrived in the Amazon from Peru. Their narrative has been published. Lieutenant Smyth occupied more than eight months in this difficult enterprise. Lt. Lister, instead of departing from Lima to float down the Guallaga, (Capt. Klause's route) went by sea to Truxillo, thence to Balas Puerto; he followed the course of the Chaciguco and finished his expedition in seven months.

[Buffalo Com. Advertiser.

☞ Kingston (U. C.) was visited by a destructive fire on the 17th ultimo.

☞ According to the Bangor Whig the potatoe disease which prevails to such an alarming extent in England, has communicated to the herrings and other fish.

☞ A small boat, containing three boys, was carried over the Hooksett Falls, N. H. on Tuesday afternoon last. They were all drowned. They were the sons of Mr. Whitney of Hooksett.
