INVOCATION TO NIGHT.

(LINES WRITTEN IN AUTUMN.) BY ROBERT F. GREELEY.

Come, gentle Night! in thy robe of sheen,
With thy mild blue eye, and thy starry train;
More fair art thou than earth's fairest queen—
Fairer, and worthier, far, to reign!
When Day, with its scorching heat is o'er,
And the sweat-drops hang on the sun-burnt brow,
What joy 't is to lie by the lone lake-shore,
Conceal'd 'neath the shade of some spreading bough!

All things seem trance'd in a holy spell,
As thy wish'd-for hour draws slowly nigh,
And the shadows creep o'er the grassy dell,
As daylight fades in the purpling sky:—
Then, from her couch beneath the sea,
Enwrapped in a veil of silvery light,
The moon comes up, all silently,
And the waves rejoice in her radiance bright.

The air is light with the falling drops,
Exhaled from her robes of starry hue,
And the flowers unfold their tiny cups,
To catch a draught of the fragrant dew.
The willows that droop o'er the slumbering stream
Are laving their tips in the tranquil tide,
While the reeds, that have basked in the Day God's beam,
Are whispering peacefully, side by side.

The chastened beams of the Autumn moon
Lie in diamond drops on the glistening strand,
While the stunted shrubs that are scattered aboon
Seem like figures and forms from fairy-land.
The elfins are merrily frolicking
'Neath each buttercup green, and waving brier,
And the tinkling notes of this wildwood-spring
Are the trembling tones of some fairy lyre!

Sweet hour of Night! to all bosoms dear!
Thou bearest a spell on thy viewless wings,
That drives from the manly breast all fear,
And nerveth the Soul to mighty things!

A GREEN ONE DONE FOR.—Yesterday morning a green youth from the country, while passing through the Park, was accosted by a couple of very gentlemanly rogues, who, seeing that he was fresh from the country, offered to show him the sights, and accordingly they started to see the wild beasts in the gallery of the Park Theatre. While they were ascending the stairs one of the rogues picked up a well-filled pocket-book, which he thrust very hastily into his pocket, as if he wished not to be seen. His companion, however, accused him of intending to conceal it, and after some pretty hard words, it was finally agreed to give it to the countryman for $10, and he to advertise it, receiving of course a large reward. The young man having no money, and eager to make so handsome a speculation, suffered one of the rogues to take his over-coat to pledge; and as he did not return, the other fellow, presuming that the coat was insufficient to raise that amount, borrowed the countryman's watch to add to it, and disappeared, leaving the pocket-book in the countryman's possession. Of course, neither of them have been since seen; and of course, the pocket-book was filled with worthless bills. That young man was entirely too green to have been trusted in this city alone.

MUTINY ON A COAL BOAT.—A most flagrant breach of nautical discipline occurred on one of these graceful crafts on Tuesday. It appears the vessel was drawn up as near the landing as possible, for the purpose of discharging freight into the carts driven out for the purpose. One of the cartmen contracted for a load, and the Captain directed the gentleman who discharges the duties of first mate and crew, to assist in throwing in the load. That individual not only declined doing so, but politely requested the Captain to "go to the Devil." Instead of complying that dignitary shyed a reasonably-sized chunk of coal at his refractory officer's head. A regular cannonade then commenced, which ended in the commandant being driven from his own quarter-deck: he 'took to the water,' literally, and made his escape—The affair was finally compromised—to save the time of U. S. Court—by the defeated party treating to whisky and water. There were several other boats lying along-side, which might have checked the mutiny by a few broadsides of coal stones, but, unfortunately, the crews were not on board to man the guns.
