THE AUTUMN GIRL—GOLF AND OTHERWISE

CONTINUED USE OF MAGPIE EFFECTS, BOTH OUT DOORS AND INDOORS.

THE autumn girl is the best of all the girls, healthier, handsomer even than the summer girl. And it pays to buy her clothes, for, with her bright eyes and red-brown cheeks, she sets them off so well.

The athletic girl, in her reaction from piazza-and-trailing-skirt days, for awhile went to the extreme of not caring very much how she looked, what she wore. But gradually a change has come over her, and now she shows careful thought for her appearance.

Instead of choosing some dowdy, worn-out old thing in which to array herself for her sports, she selects suitable cut and material for the gown in which she plays her games. Perhaps she spends more time and money on "field" clothes than on her ball gowns, and we believe she would be wise to do so, for they appear in the garish light of day, when defects are painfully visible. The "magpie" combination (our old friend, black-and-white) the golf girl will probably select this fall for her costume on the links, and somewhere about the costume there will undoubtedly be visible a dash of cherry red or a bit of oriental embroidery.

In a golf costume, the skirt is of paramount importance, as the player usually discards her jacket when following the ball from hole to hole. But the coat, when finally donned, should be one that need not shame the wearer. The suit here pictured is one of the season's best; the skirt, with its trim fit and straight lines; the plaits of the coat matching well with the skirt, and the modish black belt and stock adding very good touches. The white felt hat with the black velvet and black quill, complete the "magpie" effect.

All summer we have had the open-work embroidery, and still have a continuation on the wool stuffs for fall and winter. Oriental, and also a sort of padded, raised embroidery, will be popular, much of which can be copied by skillful fingers at home. Jet will be used again, but perhaps not as freely as last year. Velvet buttons, appliques of cloth and velvet, frills and ruching are among the fancies of the season.

Last week we spoke of changeable and fancy silks for linings, and now have a word to say in regard to shoe silks for dress materials. From time to time the shot silks come into fashion, and one does not wonder at the hold they have; for they are so beautiful, their hues changing with every change of light, such lovely combinations of color observable in their make-up. The shot-silk gowns will be built after old-fashioned models, much befrilled and be-ruched.

BARGAIN NEGLIGES—SOME MODISH ACCESSORIES

THIS IS THE TIME TO GET BARGAINS, AND GOOD ONES, TOO.

STILL one can pick up summer bargains, especially good bargains in the way of teagowns and negligees. For styles do not change greatly for these garments, and if one finds something pretty and becoming, one may feel safe that it will be sufficiently in fashion for some time to come. And all through the winter one can make use of the fluffy, light sacks and gowns for home wear, our houses being over-heated to a degree when cold reigns without.

Though wools seem more appropriate for fall and winter negligees, yet many ladies will employ the ones of light mulls and China silks which the stores are selling at greatly reduced prices. And such pretty, pretty things these are that are going for a song; such charming low-necked, elbow-sleeved affairs; such soft, trailing robes. This week we picture two of the many that caught our fancy; a neglige of white crepe de chine, and a little flowered challis. The first would be a very appropriate model for ponge, too; the yoke and top of the sleeves should be of lace, and the velvet lacings may be of any color preferred. The velvet employed on the white crepe de chine shown in the cut is an emerald green, very effective with the white crepe. The other little neglige is of lightweight wool, simple, comfortable and considerably warmer than the sheer material of the more elaborate neglige.

A very effective, beautiful teagown designed for the early days of fall is made of cream serge embroidered in dull rich silks suggestive of the orient, and further ornamented with black velvet ribbon, the long ends finished with silk fringe. The tassels and fringe now so fashionable are very suitable trimmings for these at-home gowns. The teagown described might be made of either cashmere or veiling, but the serge seems best with the oriental embroidery.

The long shoulder effects concerning which one reads so much and of which one sees so much, are absolutely necessary for those who would dress a la mode. One good way of obtaining the long, sloping shoulder is by the use of a deep collar or cape. When one is able to afford fine real lace for this, well and good; but never wear the elaborate imitations that are at present so depressingly common. Collars and capes of fine batiste are in very good style, and can be procured at reasonable prices. Pelerine shapes reign, and the bertha and fichu are approved. In Paris—of all places—there has appeared the modest neck handkerchief of mull, which Quaker accessory seems to belong rather to Philadelphia.

Speaking of mull, there is nothing daintier in the way of neckwear than the hemstitched mull, or very fine linen lawn, turnover collars one sees occasionally. When intaglated and worn with small cuffs to match, they give the ordinary shirt-waist suit an air of neatness and gentility quite refreshing in these days of fussiness.

Another article of dress now noticeable in the world's center of fashion is the very small handkerchief. But it is doubtful if the tiny thing will have much vogue over here.

Distress After Eating Cured.

Judge W. T. Holland, of Greensburg La., who is well and favorably known says: "Two years ago I suffered greatly from indigestion. After eating, great distress would invariably result, lasting for an hour or so and my nights were restless. I concluded to try Kodol Dyspepsia Cure and it cured me entirely. Now my sleep is refreshing and digestion perfect." Sold by The Winston Drug Co.

DRINKING AND THINKING.

Pointed Reply to the Flippant Inquiry of a Writer Who Used Liquor.

We wish to answer seriously a seemingly flippant inquiry, omitting, of course, the signature of the writer, says the New York American.

"Will you tell me how I manage to think my most beautiful thinks in drink?"

Some men really do their best work under the influence of drink for this reason: Drink has weakened their nerves and put their constitutions and vitality below par. They do their best work when they drink, just as a poor, thin, abused, tired cart horse does his best work when he is lashed with a whip. This does not speak well for the whip, does it? It does not prove that the lashing of the horse is a noble process or the whip an admirable instrument. It simply proves that if you abuse an unfortunate creature and render him unfit for work, you must abuse him still more to get a little work out of him.

You think your most beautiful thoughts in drink for various reasons.

In the first place, when you drink you are quite easily pleased, and you are pleased most easily with yourself. If you were sober, your thoughts would not seem so beautiful to you. Often what you think in drink you would be very sorry to hear repeated in your dull, sober hours.

In the second place, feeling is essential to any strong thinking. It is essential to the expression of any strong emotion. The man who drinks hard or even comes to rely to any extent upon drink has dead nerves and a dead imagination when his drink time is over.

Drink sets the heart to beating; it sets the blood to pumping through the brain; it stimulates the mysterious combustion of matter which results in thought, and emotion becomes stronger in proportion to the strength that accompanies this combustion.

The coward wants to fight when he is drunk. He has some feeling. The dull mind gets imaginative. It has some feeling. This does not glorify the coward or make the dull mind better. It usually makes both ridiculous and pathetic, in addition to being cowardly and dull.

Stop drinking for six months, sleep two hours more per day than you sleep at present, take in more fresh air, think steadily and soberly instead of talking boisterously, as you probably do now. We venture to predict that you will soon find springing up in your head some very acceptable "thinks" with which drink will have nothing to do.

ALCOHOL AND THE SOLDIER.

German Officer Radically Opposed to Use of Liquor in the Army.

An interesting contribution to the discussion growing out of the custom of giving liquor to soldiers is made by Count von Haeseler, until lately commander of the sixteenth army corps in Germany, and one of Emperor William's military favorites.

The count is not one of those who believe that strong drink is necessary to make a good soldier, nor does he believe that alcoholic stimulation increases the powers of endurance or the fighting quality in soldiers. On the contrary, Count von Haeseler, after 25 years of total abstinence in the army, protests strongly against the use of liquor by soldiers. He says:

"The soldier who abstains altogether is the best man. He can accomplish more, can march better and is a better soldier than the man who drinks even moderately. Mentally and physically he is better. . . . Strong drink tires and only increases thirst. For soldiers, water, coffee, and above all tea."

The testimony of this officer, who has behind him the record of long and active service in the German army, should be worth something in the discussion of a question of this kind. There is little doubt that the consensus of expert military opinion in Europe and America will affirm the correctness of his judgment. To say that a sense of weariness and thirst follows indulgence in alcoholic stimulants is merely stating a physiological fact. Excessive stimulation means a physical and mental reaction, in which the powers are at a low ebb.

In the case of the soldier it would seem to the "noncombatant" that a sober, clear-headed, well-balanced fighter is worth more in the long run than the soldier crazed into reckless daring or frenzied madness by temporary alcoholic stimulation.—Chicago Record-Herald.

ITEMS.

The Anti-Saloon league has been organized in Madison county, Iowa.

Open air meetings under the auspices of the Total Abstinence association will be held in all Chicago parks.

January 1, 1903, there were 16,658 insane persons in Scotland. The alarming growth in the number of cases is largely attributable to alcoholic excesses.

Kansas City, Kan., has been the rendezvous of the gamblers of the middle west. Mayor Gilbert has closed seven gambling houses and turned 300 slot machines to the wall. The pool-rooms were not molested.

By agreement between the temperance people and the saloon keepers, Dyersburg, Tenn., became "dry" July 1. The last day of the sale of whisky saw many fights, in one of which a knife was used with serious results.

Prominent brewers of Ohio will manufacture a mildly alcoholic beer from rice. They hope in this way to nullify the effect of the supreme court's recent decision that Bishop's beer and other malt liquors are taxable under the Dow law.

To the Patrons of the Training School.

In order that all children may be supplied with material promptly, a charge of $1.00, payable at the opening of school, will be made. There is no profit in this to the school. The charge is made simply that all children may have necessary material for work without delay. Those pupils, who have not heretofore attended the Training school, as well as those who may have conditions to get off, will have an opportunity to stand written examinations to determine what grade they will enter on the 11th of September at 9 o'clock. The Training school, together with the Kindergarten, will begin Monday, September 14th, at 8:40 a. m.

A CAREFUL MAN.

"What in the world!" gasped Mrs. Thompkins.

The Thompkins were about to start on the annual Sunday school picnic given by their church. Mrs. Thompkins had finished putting dainty little sandwiches into a large hamper basket and was tucking the cloth that covered them nicely down when Mr. Thompkins entered.

He had on a winter suit of clothes and was carrying a half dozen life preservers in one arm. Behind him came a boy carrying rain coats, blankets, a medicine chest, a half dozen umbrellas, and numerous mysterious looking packages.

"Mrs. Thompkins," said the head of the house, impressively, "this is one picnic at which there will be some one who had brains enough to prepare properly for emergencies. Picnics are always wretchedly disappointing affairs. That is because the people who go to them content themselves with taking little slices of bread stuck around microscopic pieces of ham, angel's food cake, 16 lemons, and a fan, instead of taking along things that are really essential.

"I propose to-day to demonstrate how one can go to a picnic and enjoy oneself and make others have a good time. It invariably rains at a picnic. Yet, how many think to provide themselves with umbrellas and rain coats? It always turns cold at a picnic; yet people go out wearing the thinnest clothes they happen to have. Children go boat riding and fall into the water and are drowned because no one had sense enough to put life preservers on them.

Arrived at the picnic grounds Mr. Thompkins called all the children around him and informed them that no one was to go boat riding without putting on a life preserver and carry an umbrella, so there would be no danger of their either being sunstruck or drowned. There was a wailing protest, but Mr. Thompkins stood firm, and so the children put on the life preservers and took their umbrellas. The boys who had to row the boats pointed out that they could not row and hold umbrellas over their heads at the same time, and so another boy was appointed to sit behind the one who rowed and hold the umbrella. The boats had no sooner got out into the stream than there was a collision between two of them. The oarsmen could not see the other boats because of the umbrellas held over their heads and the colliding boats promptly keeled over, and with many whoops and howls the occupants went into the water.

"Hurrah, hurrah!" shouted Mr. Thompkins, jumping up and down. "Ah, my wonderful foresight! They've all got life preservers on. Get out the medicine chest at once."

Mr. Thompkins was throwing off his coat and shoes, and as he did so shouted: "I will rescue them.

Then he dived madly into the river. His head and shoulders went out of sight, but his feet remained above water, kicking violently. One of the hack drivers and Mrs. Thompkins grabbed the heels and after a violent tug succeeded in pulling Mr. Thompkins back on shore, with a piece of wood they dug mud out of his eyes and ears and then excavated a place for his mouth so that he could talk.

"Save the children," gasped Mr. Thompkins. "I dived into the mud."

"Why, the children are splashing water on each other and having a pleasant time," said Mrs. Thompkins. "The water is only about two feet deep. I don't think you need mind rescuing them."

Mr. Thompkins looked utterly crushed and crawled down to the river and washed the mud off his face and then retired to his medicine chest, where he sat waiting for the terrible accident that he knew was sure to come.

Suddenly there was a sharp report, and a small girl appeared, crying violently. Mr. Thompkins with a bound threw open the medicine chest and grabbed out an array of shining knives, court plaster, and bandages. He threw a book to Mrs. Thompkins and ordered her to find the chapter on "What To Do in Case of Gunshot Wounds."

"Don't cry, little girl," commanded Mr. Thompkins. "Keep perfect-ly cool. We will take the bullet right out. Now, where are you wounded?"

"I hain't wounded," said the small girl. "Tommy Hawkins is shooting off firecrackers an' he won't let me shoot any."

Mr. Thompkins looked as though he thought the small child had done him a personal injury. He sat down and sulked while he waited for the day to turn cold or for a heavy rain to commence falling or somebody to get killed or drowned. He was terribly downcast, but on the way home, when he was expecting Mrs. Thompkins to make some sly dig at him for carrying a lot of useless traps to a picnic, he felt immensely relieved and delighted when she said: "And I am so glad you took all the things you did to the picnic."

"Ah," said Mr. Thompkins, sitting up and smilling. "I was afraid you wouldn't think much of my prudence and forethough."

"O, indeed, I do," replied Mrs. Thompkins. "You see, when you are prepared for emergencies and sit around looking for accidents to happen, why, nothing ever happens. Mrs. Bright says she wants you to be sure to come to their picnic next week and to imagine all sorts of dreadful things, and Mrs. Jones wants you to come to their picnic, and, in fact, I think you'll be in great demand. The children all think you are a splendid mascot and they want to tie pink ribbons in your beard like they did with the goat they had for a mascot last year. They say you are a much better mascot than the goat."

Mr. Thompkins climbed up on the seat and rode the rest of the way home with the driver.
