NEW-YORK TRIBUNE.

For The Tribune.

TO KATE AND AGNES.

Love gives, 'tis said, the stars their hue
And to the gentle moon
Imparts a pale and tender light,
Which maidens love effusion.

Last eve I plucked a laurel branch—
A laurel fresh and green—
And bound it on two fairer brows
Than Peri e'er hath seen.

One had a calmer, milder glow,
But both were brighter far
Than Summer moon, with all its light,
Or Eve's soft shining star.

Eve's star hung just above the hills,
A little space above,
And as I bound each laurel wreath
Seemed twinkling thoughts of love.

Not love, mayhap, for gentle Kate,
Nor Agnes, witching sprite—
But for the round and glorious moon,
And all the starry light.

For if you looked upon the grass
Each ray seemed set in dew,
As up the meadow path we trod
A sparkling ocean through.

In such an hour I feel return
The dream which childhood knew,
When all was bright and beautiful,
And hearts were kind and true.

But ah! what phantoms—back they glide;
The stars fade out from sight,
So gentle Kate and Agnes fair,
And all but Sleep, good night!
