VOL. XXII, NO. 3. ASTORIA, OREGON, FRIDAY, JULY 11, 1884. PRICE, FIVE CENTS.

THE NATIONAL DEMOCRARIC CONVENTION.

The Nomination of the Candidates.

CHICAGO, July 9th.—At 3 P. M. the call of states for nominations for president and vice president commenced.

When the state of Delaware was called there was an immediate outbreak of cheers. After the uproar had subsided, Mr. George Gray of Delaware came to the platform and addressed the convention. He said he had been instructed to present the name of a man who was worthy to receive the nomination. He did so under a realizing sense of the great responsibility, relying upon the convention to act so that the great opportunity which God himself, he reverently believed had given them, should not pass away unimproved. The Republican nomination had flung defiance into the face of American manhood and had shocked the conscience of the best men in that party. Such a nomination was a sign of the decadence of that great party, not a sign of increasing strength. The Democracy called for a candidate who had been tried in the balance and never found wanting. The Democracy demanded a statesman whose experience was known; it demanded a leader whose chivalric courage would never falter, and who could and would bring to the dust the "plumed knight" of false pretense and of personal dishonor; it demanded a man of private character which would bear the malignant tongue of slander: it demanded a man who should be, in his public and private character, the very antithesis and opposite of the nominee of the Republican party. The man who was that, and more, whose name was now leaping from heart to mouth, was Thomas F. Bayard. [Loud cheers.] Mr. Bayard, as a candidate, would make no mistakes. His name would still the voice of calumny; he would carry every doubtful state, and would make some Republican states doubtful. Enthusiasm would take the place of apathy, and the dreary November would be made glorious by the pæans of Democratic victory. [Loud cheers].

INDIANA NAMES M'DONALD.

When the state of Indiana was called Mr. Hendricks of that state came to the platform, and amid loud applause said that the people demanded a change in the management of affairs, and if the convention would give them the opportunity they would execute the purpose in the election of president. He believed that the nominee of this convention would become the chosen president of the United States—the first inaugurated Democratic president in twenty-four years. [Cheers].

He spoke of the official corruption of the Republican party, and referred to Secretary Chandler's recent testimony before a senate committee, in which he said that the defalcations in his bureaus would not exceed $67,000, and yet 24 years ago an administration had gone down because of the defalcation of $60,000, and the only one.

In regard to the civil service, he said there were men of ability in the public service, and he would not ask that they should be driven out of office. None but the unfit should be condemned; none but the fittest should survive.

Referring to the foreign policy of the government, he said it would be a beautiful spectacle if this Republic, so strong, so sure, should lead the nations in a movement for permanent peace and for the relief of the people everywhere from standing armies and masterful war. He then came down to the main subject of his speech and suggested for the consideration of the convention a citizen of the state of Indiana, Joseph E. McDonald. [Cheers.] He sketched Mr. McDonald's career and declared if he were in the White House no man who would go to see him there would find fault with the candid, frank manner of his reception. He did not speak for himself alone, or McDonald alone, but for the great state of Indiana, which had instructed the delegates to present Mr. McDonald's name to this great convention.

Mr. McDonald was a man who had favored monetization of silver, and the saving of the Pacific coast from coolie servile labor. A wise legislator, a true financier, a brave statesman; his record glittered with the stars of truth, and all might see its glory. Every star in it was a Democratic star, and all its glories were those of the people's [cheers]; and his name was presented by a great state. He therefore presented that time, and all he asked was justice.

General Black of Illinois seconded the nomination of McDonald. They would present, he said, a platform which would appeal to the sober judgment of the people. They also needed a man whose antecedents, known of all men, constituted a satisfactory answer to all reasonable objections. They needed a man whose views on all public questions could be found without a search warrant, and determined without an inquisition. No matter where the Democratic candidate for the presidency lived, Indiana had always been found true; but that fact should not sit in judgment against her.

CALIFORNIA NOMINATES THURMAN.

Mr. Spencer—When California was called she had no candidate to present at that moment. The gentleman who was to present her candidate was temporarily absent owing to sickness. He is now present and we would ask the privilege of allowing California to name its candidate.

The Chair—The chair hearing no objection the privilege will be granted. California is considered as called.

Mr. Spencer—Our delegates have decided that Hon. John W. Breckenridge shall present the name of its candidate.

The Chair—Gentlemen of the convention: The honorable John W. Breckenridge, son of the last democratic vice president who was not unjustly deprived of his office, will now address the convention, as a representative of the state of California.

Mr Breckenridge, on taking the platform, was received with hearty applause, and spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the convention: By inadvertence California was passed in this democratic convention, but we desire to say to you that when the ballots are cast in November next she will never be passed by the republican candidate. [Applause.] She has sent us here, her representatives, in few and simple words, to present for the consideration of the democratic party a man who needs no eulogy at her hands; whose name is enshrined in the hearts of the whole American people. There never was, in the history of a party, a rarer or a grander opportunity to make an appeal to the country.

THE MAN TO PRESENT.

Let us present a man of whose integrity there has never been a question; upon whose character or reputation there has never fallen a shadow, or blot, or stain; whose ability and learning shall be commensurate with the high office to which we would elevate him. Let us nominate such a one, place him side by side with his antithesis, the "plumed knight" of Maine' and simply say to the people, "Behold the man!" [Applause.]

Gentlemen of this convention, we of California believe that we can confidently turn and say, "Behold the man; Allan G. Thurman of Ohio!" [Loud cheers and applause, several delegates rising in their seats and waving their hats.] Of all the honored and illustrious names which have been and shall be presented for the consideration of this convention there are none that lie dearer to the great heart of the American people than that lofty and intrepid statesman, who for more than twenty years has been the boldest and ablest advocate of democratic doctrines and democratic principles.

California did not send us to waste our time in eulogies, but simply to present his name. This man, at the close of the war, when the echoes of that strife was still vibrating in the air, annihilated in the great state of Ohio the republican majority of nearly 40,000. We are told that their only objection to him is that Ohio is an October state, and our reply is, gentlemen, that this is not a state but a national convention, and we are here to select a national candidate. [Applause.]

M'KENZIE NOMINATES CARLISLE.

When Kentucky was reached, J. McKenzie took the platform, amid great enthusiasm, and presented the name of Carlisle.

There were cheers and hisses when E. J. G. Abbott of Massachusetts arose. That gentleman said he had no name for presentation to the convention at that time.

LOCKWOOD NOMINATES CLEVELAND.

Lockwood of New York then took the platform to nominate Cleveland, and was received with cheers. He presented that gentleman's qualifications in a forcible manner, and commanded the greatest attention of any delegate, eliciting frequent applause. Every mention of the New York governor's name was received with hearty cheers, delegates rising to their feet.

Mayor Harrison of Chicago seconded the nomination of Cleveland, and was received with an ovation.

A motion to adjourn to 7:30 was lost.

Grady appealed to the convention to take such action as would keep the democratic party fully united. Referring in complimentary terms to the other candidates, Grady closed by warning them of the result if some other candidate be chosen. [Cheers and hisses.]

Cochrane of New York moved to suspend the order of business and take a recess to 8 P. M. Lost.

A demand for a call of the roll of states was overruled by the chair.

Cochrane of New York took the platform to speak. Objections were made throughout the hall; and a point of order was made that Cochrane could not speak unless he presented a candidate. He said he was there to second a candidate, and he was allowed to proceed. His speech was well received and he was frefrequently applauded. He said that a number thought Cleveland could carry New York, while a number thought he could not. One side must be wrong, but why take chances when all could unite on Thurman.

At 6:20 the convention adjourned until 10:30 A. M. to-morrow.
