HONG KONG'S DOPE FARMER

Big Dinner Which Marked His Retirement from Office.

ROYAL BOSS OF MONGOLIAN PIPERS

A Position That Lasts but One Year and Makes the Holder Rich—Some Curious Features of the Sumptuous Feast.

In the colony of Hong Kong there is a Chinaman who, while his brief reign lasts, is spoken of by the quarter of a million of his fellow countrymen on the island with bated breath. To these Celestials, subjects of Queen Victoria, the emperor of China is not nearly so great a man as the "opium farmer," and the queen herself, compared with "his mightiness of the drug," is in their eyes only a far-away sovereign, not half so imposing.

In order to regulate to some extent the importation of opium into Hong Kong and to simplify the collection of duties, relates the Chicago Times-Herald, the British government several years ago decided to place the whole business in the hands of one man. Realizing, however, the tremendous and arbitrary power that could be wielded by a single individual in such a position, it was also decided that the office should only be held one year, and that no person should be allowed to keep it for more than a single term. So it was announced that the government was prepared to accept bids for the privilege.

Since that time the selection of an "opium farmer," as he is called, has become an annual event. The highest bid generally ranges from 600,000 to 800,000 taels, according to the prospects of the poppy crop for the year and the condition of the market. The successful applicant is duly gazetted in his position and he is given the assistance of a fleet of a dozen swift government customs vessels to protect his interests. He himself employs several junks to guard his business against smugglers, but he must only use these boats for the purpose of obtaining information. If he secures knowledge of smuggling operations he turns it over to the authorities, who run the malefactors down. Nearly every week in the year there is a smart skirmish between the sampans of the smugglers from the mainland of China and the revenue cutters. Pretty little battles some of them are, too, and very useful in giving young British middies and junior naval officers their first taste of sea fighting.

The opium farmer has the sole control of every pound of the drug brought into Hong Kong, and he generally makes from $250,000 to $300,000 clear profit in his year of office. The government gets much more from him than it could secure if it attempted to collect the duties itself and, moreover, gets it in a lump sum without the enormous amount of trouble and the large force of officers that would otherwise be necessary. The opium farmer's salaried men watch
