Towards night the fact of his death could no longer be concealed. "Major Ogden dead!" passed from mouth to mouth, the last sentence many ever uttered.

All was confusion, not only at the Fort, but in Pawnee and the adjoining settlements. Everywhere were evidences of grief.

As darkness was approaching, Mr. Morris, with the assistance of Mr. Joseph Myer, lowered the body of Major Ogden into his grave. Those two men, who had done many noble deeds, were physically unable to endure another hour's work, so they went to their homes weary and sad of heart.

A modest monument was afterwards erected to the memory of Major Ogden upon a high knoll at Fort Riley.

But a hard fate was in store for Pawnee. The sturdy defence of freedom by its citizens had given much offense to the authorities at Washington. The town where such a manly struggle had been made for law and order, and which it was evident would become a rallying place for all who desired to see Kansas a free State was odious to the supporters of slavery. It was, therefore, determined to wipe Pawnee from the face of the earth. For bringing about that result there was ample legal machinery, and no delay was made in putting that machinery into operation.

In the original survey for Fort Riley, which had been accepted at headquarters at Washington, a tract three miles square had been laid out for the Fort Reservation. But now President Pierce ordered a new survey for the Reservation of ten miles square, which made the site of Pawnee and miles of the surrounding country Government property. Rumors of this new survey reached Pawnee as the summer was drawing to a close. The people resented this injustice, but they were powerless. Many had invested all they had in making improvements and preparing for another year.

One day in September, as evening was approaching, a squad of mounted troops rode into Pawnee. They came to give official notice that the site of Pawnee had been taken for the use of the Government and all of its citizens must vacate their homes on or before the tenth of October. Many refused to listen to the grievous words of the officer in command and shut themselves in their dwellings. But this of course availed them nothing. On every house and structure in the place was found next morning tacked to the door a placard headed "Proclamation," and signed "Franklin Pierce, President of the United States." The angry people, in their rage and despair, pulled down the placards, tore them into shreds and stamped upon them. But unfortunately that did not help the matter in the least.

On the next day the Quartermaster at the Fort made the lower story of the capitol building a commissionary department.

The officer in charge told Mr. Morris, who was still occupying the upper story, and was strapped to his bed with an injured leg, that he would hold him responsible for the goods beneath. This so enraged his friends, that they at once, although late at night, carried him and all his household goods to the vacant house of Government Reeder.

The following morning found every man scouring the country for shelter for his family, or for the family of a friend. Some abandoned log huts were found, and these were soon taken possession of.

And so the days passed by.

The three weeks of grace were almost over, and the much dreaded tenth of October would soon be upon them, with all its possible horrors and attending miseries. The fall rains prevented much progress in the work of getting out logs and building houses; still every fair hour was made the most of.

The ninth of the month found many still in their homes, if homes these houses could be called. But they reasoned, "Surely, we will not be turned out; leniency will be shown us, for we are a part of the Government."

What good were the vacant houses, except to be pulled down or burned? And yet the men who had built them, who had invested their hard-earned money in these rough sheltering places, were driven out, with no place to lay their heads, with no protection from the coming winter storms!

At midnight of the ninth, a few of the men feeling reckless, concluded to have some fun, even though tomorrow would be all sadness. Collecting tin pans, cow bells and every article by which could be made a noise, they went to the house of a man named Knapp, and, at a given sigcal, commenced to play upon these musical instruments. Knapp had retired, feeling nervous about the morrow, and but just fallen asleep when he was awakened by this unearthly noise. Without dressing, and but half awake, he quickly arose, and falling upon his knees, begged of "Angel Gabriel"—for this he supposed his visitor to be—"to let him alone until morning, and he would surely vacate."

The night of the tenth found a few families still in Pawnee. Sickness had prevented some from leaving, and utter impossibility to finish or get shelter kept the rest prisoners.

Then it was that the troops came down from the Fort, and committed the outrage of pulling the houses down over the people's heads. When Mr. Morris moved out of Governor Reeder's house, the families of Knapp and Mably moved in, as it afforded them better shelter.

The soldiers threw ropes around the upper story and pulled it over on the ground, causing the women and children to rush out into the cold, with only their night-clothes on.

Going to the house of Mr. Dixon, the soldiers found him away. Mrs. Dixon was sick in bed with an infant three days old.

The soldiers were ordered to take hold of the mattress and carry her out on the prairie, just over the line of Reservation. She begged and implored to be left alone, but it was useless. On Mr. Dixon's return, he brought her back to her home. But the soldiers again finding her, took her out, setting fire to the house behind them. The little infant survived all this, and is a woman now.

So the supporters of slavery had their revenge, and Pawnee was in ruins, with but one whole house, and that the capitol building. This was was full of all kinds of provisions.

The people who had staked their all in Pawnee were outcasts, living in holes in the ground, log huts, and tents, with the cold freezing weather upon them, with their children crying for bread, with their cattle dying about them. Can we find heart to condemn them, if the the spirit of retaliation took possession of them?

One morning the officers at the Fort were informed that the Commissionary at Pawnee had been pillaged, and all the stores of provisions were gone.

No one knew where these things had disappeared, and no one ever told.

Little by little the people carried away the boards, doors and windows, and used them in making their houses more comfortable. Some of those driven from Pawnee located just east of the Reservation, laid out a town and named it Ogden. The logs from Governor Reeder's were hauled to Ogden, and converted into a house that can be seen to-day.

And thus it is that the stone building which stands not far from Fort Riley is all that is left of the City of Pawnee, the first Capitol of Kansas.
