SANDY'S BEAR TRAP.

A HUNDRED years ago Sandy was a boy of 15. The world would have moved round faster and everything gone smoothly could he have had his turn to rule.

Sandy's advice was the last thing, however, that Sandy's father, a grave faced Scotchman, thought of asking. Nobody, in fact, gave much attention to his opinions, except Peter Small, their hired man, who always agreed with any one who talked with him.

Sandy's father had bought a large tract of land in New Hampshire, and had led a little band of settlers to locate upon it with himself. He was a rich man for his place, bringing with him a good supply of farm tools and household wares, horses, cattle, sheep and hogs.

The last were an insecure possession, for the woods were full of bears, and every little while a pig was missing.

The bear question was one on which Sandy had strong opinions. "I know," said he to Peter Small, "My father is called a wise headed man, but it seems to me like monstrous foolishness the way things go on here. All father talks about is of getting a new road cut through to the main road and of having houses finished before winter. Now, first of all, we ought to get rid of the bears. We ought to have a bear hunt at least twice a week, and have somebody keep watch every night."

"Yes," said Peter Small, "it's dreadful needful to kill off the bears. Some folks set traps."

"Let's we," said Sandy.

"No, Sandy, I hain't time," replied Peter, leaning on the spade with which he was digging.

"Well, tell me how," said Sandy. "I'll make one."

Peter, laying by his spade, sat down on a log, and told Sandy how to take some "springy" saplings and some rope and a great stone, and arrange them "Indian fashion" into a trap.

Sandy, after feeding time, set such a trap beside the pen where the hogs, for safety's sake, were kept confined.

What delight it would be to find a caught bear in the morning.

But about midnight there was such a sound of terrific squealing that Sandy's father, the hired man and Sandy himself all rushed out together. They found some fallen poles, a rock that had slipped and the little black pig which had rooted out beneath the pen, tangled up in a network of hair bed cord.

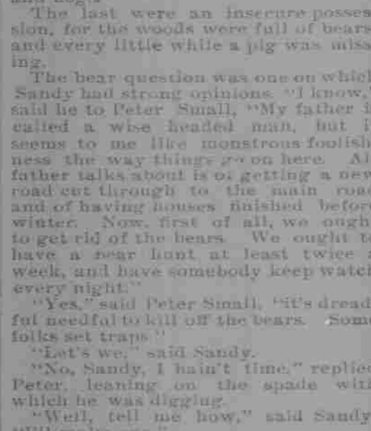
"What's this? What is this?" asked Sandy's father.

"It's Sandy's bear trap," said Peter Small with a grin; and poor Sandy for weeks after heard nothing but inquiries about bear skins and black pigs and "his trap."

"Peter's always agreeing and agreeing—he might say he helped to plan it," said Sandy to himself, a little bitterly.

But the time for roasting ears had come, and the bears who never waited for roasting, then began to make depredations on the corn.

"I've thought of a new plan," said Sandy, going to Peter Small from sheer force of habit. "You know the great scalding tub Cooper Brown made that's out there by the barn? Well, I'm going to shock up a lot of corn, pile it all around it, lie down in the tub, have father's gun close at hand, and if the bear comes near, up and shoot him before he can eat a kernel! That's what I'm going to do."



"I KNEW I COULD CATCH SOME BEARS."

"Well, Sandy, you're a wise one," said Peter, shaking his head admiringly.

It was a lovely night, soft and clear. Sandy lay curled up in the immense tub, and heard the wind whispering in the corn leaves, and saw above him the great dipper and now and then the startling brightness of a shooting star.

The night air grew cooler—not too cool, for Sandy had taken with him a big woolen quilt, and lay with it wrapped about him. Slowly the hours moved, but never the slightest sound of bears broke the hush, only the crickets piping in the weeds. He began to feel sleepy and woke himself by power of will, and then—and then——

It was full morning when he woke. The sun shone brightly into the scalding tub, and into his face. How foolish he had been to think the bears might come near!

Suddenly he heard some one calling "Sandy! Sandy!" It seemed like Peter's voice, but why his tones so imploring? Slowly he raised his head and peeped over the edge of the tub. What was it? What had happened? All the shocks of corn were torn down, pulled apart, scattered everywhere. The ears lay half eaten all around.

Peter Small came up, his hair flying and his face white. "Well, Sandy, you've scart me this time!" he said. "When I see how the bears had been round, and I didn't see you, I was afraid they'd dragged you off and eaten you up, like as not, but why didn't you shoot. Durst you fire?"

"Durst to!" exclaimed Sandy. "Durst to! I didn't see 'em."

"Not see 'em?" cried Peter, "you don't mean to say you slept through it?"

Sandy silently bowed his head. "I guess you'd better not say anything about it," he remarked at last.

"No, sartain," said Peter. "Folks might laugh at you."

So Sandy gathered up the shocks of corn and the scattered ears, and the next night, as Peter advised, went to his bed in the house.

Peter, after he was gone, brought more shocks and put them round the tub, and, wrapped in his blanket, lay down in it.

When morning came he called out all the household and showed a dead bear, with a fat cub lying among the corn. Two others had managed to escape.

"I knew I could ketch some bears. I planned it up to watch in the scalding tub," he said triumphantly.

"I don't like folks that are always agreeing and agreeing; they're kind of traps themselves," said Sandy afterward.

WELL WON;

Or, the Whaler's Wife.

Nantucket Jack was in a melancholy mood because there seemed to be no chance that he would ever win May Blossom, the captain's daughter. The preferred suitor was the mate, Boles, who had made a record as a whaler and stood high in favor.

So Jack longed for an opportunity to distinguish himself and this is how it came: The crew had pursued a whale of great value and almost killed it, when they saw a squall coming on.

All the boats at once cut away to seek the ship, but Jack was for holding on and refused to lose such a prize. His crew deserted him and left him to cope with the monster alone.

And now a truly desperate combat took place. Alternately working the light craft with skillful hand, and plying his lance—with the spray all around him—with the whale's flukes whipping the air about his head, and the white scroll of the jaw occasionally almost grasping the boat, Jack fought desperately with this 'old king of the sea," so close to him all the time that the whale, the boat, the fishing lance and the nimble form of the young man, seemed almost blended into one. Aboard the man-of-war crew and officers were excited witnesses of this combat. The shrouds, the booms and all the sails were alive with blue jackets, while even those aloft, stowing canvas to prepare for the squall, kept an eye upon the strange spectacle of this one brave man struggling with so mighty an antagonist.

All at once a ringing cheer rose from the seamen as Jack, planting his lance near the "life spot," caused the leviathan to spout blood. The movements of the monster now were more feeble; he swam round and round, his spout becoming lower every moment; and finally, with one last, desperate flurry, he rolled over stone dead.

An officer—the first lieutenant—now sprang upon the ship's horse-block and roared through his trumpet:

"Leave your whale and come aboard here lively, my man," pointing with one hand, as he spoke, to the black rack of the roaring, screaming squall close aboard.

But Jack shook his head; for, having obtained his prize he was resolved not to run the risk of losing it.

"Ay, ay," remarked an old forecastle man; did ye ever see the like of that chap's pluck? But Davy Jones will be sure to swallow the lad in his maw, though he's escaped that of Johnny Whale."

A moment later along came the squall, booming, shrieking and shrouding Jack and his whale from sight in the whirling rack.

The man-of-war was hurled far from the spot, with the ends of her lee main and foreyards almost dipping in the seething, hissing foam, and, for a quarter of an hour, the wind blew so hard that the water was beaten down flat.

At last, when the squall had passed far to leeward Captain Blossom and his crew watched in vain for the daring young harpooner, who, instead of returning to his ship, as Boles and the others had done, had refused to cut and kept on after the whale.

With pale cheeks and streaming eyes May Blossom was among the watchers. A mist lay upon the ocean in the direction where her lover was last seen, and as the Meteor kept on Jack's broken steering oar and the red woolen cap he had worn were discovered and picked up.

"This tells the story," said the captain sadly.

Poor May gave a despairing cry, but just then a shout was heard coming from the mist, and the girl, with flashing eyes, arched her neck and reared her head like a young colt.

"That was Jack!" she said.

And she was right. As the ship forged on the wind partly blew aside the misty curtain, showing the gallant fellow standing bareheaded in the stern sheets of his boat. By lashing the latter securely on the lee side of the whale to the barbed irons sticking in the body of the monster, he had prevented the craft from swamping in the squall. He was soon picked up, when the captain, in his joy at securing so valuable a whale after he had thought it was lost, fairly embraced the young harpooner.

"I see now," said the skipper, "that I mistook your character; that a quiet man—a man of few words—may have as much energy and pluck as a noisy one, and sometimes more. Boles was for cutting from the whale, but you held on, even in the face of death. You deserve a reward. Here it is."

To the side of the young man he drew blushing May Blossom, now happier than words can express, and placed her hand in that of brave Nantucket Jack.

Another Society Fad.

The young society belles have a new fad. To hear about it will enlighten not a few of the young men who have been mystified since the year began over the despoiling of their new hats. The fad is to take the little bow that fastens the lining of a man's hat and wear it thereafter hidden in their shoe. By some subtile influence the superstition is that without fail they will have an offer of marriage from the young man in question within the month. It must be taken without the young man's knowledge or the charm will not work, and the young ladies are resorting to all sorts of subterfuges to obtain the bows.
