A HARVEST OF TARES.

FAR off in the dim and sad and desolate past—
That shoreless and shadowless sea,
Where wrecks are driven by wave and blast,
Shattered, sunken and lost at last,
Lies the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Long ago broken for me.

"My loves were glory, and pride, and art:
Ah! dangerous rivals these!
Sweet lips might quiver and warm tears start,
Should an artist pause for a woman's heart?
Even that which was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Too rare to be broken for me!"

Alaric Langley's tenor voice floated out upon the silence in mournful melody as he sang these pathetic words. He laid his brush aside with a look of impatience stealing over his handsome face. He could hear Theda's voice in the hall without, and knew that he was going to be interrupted.

A picturesquely disordered studio, it was, away up in the top of his mother's house; a real "sky parlor," with its bronzes and marbles, its dummies and quaint suits of armor hanging against the walls. Velvet portieres separated the room from the wide hall which ran through the old-fashioned country house, and through these curtains the sweet, clear voice of Theda Grey floated lightly:

"Alaric! 'Ric dear! Mamma says come down and have lunch with her and oh, 'Ric! I want you, too!"

The portiers were parted now, and a girl stood framed in by the rich wine-colored velvet; a girl with a face worth looking at. Not a beauty, but such a soulful face. With great, lustrous dark eyes, and a tender mouth, the small head crowned with a coronet of sunny hair.

Theda Gray was a ward of Alaric Langley's mother, and had lived with them for years—a veritable sunbeam in their home. Between her and the young artist a tender affection existed. It was not a mighty passion upon his part; to tell the truth, he cared more for his art than for anything else in the world. But to Theda, he was just the one man on earth. To her, all other men were wooden inanities; and she found no pleasure in their society.

Alaric was differently constituted. He was wont to say that his nature was to "like many, and love but one." Which is all very correct in its way; only a man loses something out of his life when he divides himself impartially among casual acquaintances. What though he does keep his heart and its inner sanctuary for the one; human love is faulty and selfish, and the one craves all.

Alaric smiled into the girl's eyes as she stood there; her very presence had driven away the frown.

"I have been setting your little poem to music, Theda," he said, and a tender tone was in his voice now, a tender light in his deep dark eyes. "I like it, and yet—why did you write such a sad thing? You ought never to be sad and sorrowful, Theda."

She smiled. That smile glorified her face.

"I am never sad when I am with you, dear," she returned softly. "But the little poem seemed to write itself. It flitted through my brain and I just had to write it. I am so glad you like it, Alaric. You are the only critic for whose praises I care!"

I CAN NEVER LOVE ANY ONE.

As they descended the staircase together, where Mrs. Langley was awaiting them, Alaric read aloud from the manuscript he held in his hand, Theda's little poem:

"I told her an artist should wed his art:
That only his love should be
No other should lure me from mine apart
I said; and my cold words chilled her heart—
The heart that was breaking for me—
Poor heart!
Hopelessly breaking for me.

"I spoke of the beautiful days to come—
In the land beyond the sea—
Those years that must be wearisome
To her, but her patient lips were dumb;
Her heart broke in silence for me—
Poor heart!
Broke, yet complained not—for me.

"I pressed her hand and rebuked her tears
Lightly and carelessly
I said my triumphs should reach her ears.
And I left her alone with the dismal years,
And the heart that was breaking for me—
Poor heart!
Silently breaking for me.

"My days were dreams of summer time
My life it was victory
Fame wove bright garlands to crown my prime,
And I half forgot in that radiant clime
The heart that was breaking for me—
Poor heart!
Patiently breaking for me."

Below stairs, they found Mrs. Carlingford—an amateur artist—a very wealthy woman, and a patron of certain "rising young artists." A dangerous woman, with her bright, dark beauty and intense magnetism, which took the hearts of the other sex by storm. There was a Mr. Carlingford popularly believed to be somewhere in existence, though, so far, he had failed to materialize.

She had come to the Langley home that morning with a distinct object. Several artist friends of hers were about to start for Italy. Alaric Langley must join them. The proposition delighted the young artist. His means were sufficient. Almost before he was aware of it, he had consented. His mother never interfered in her son's art projects.

Theda said nothing and her opinion was not asked. But something within her heart lay down and died that day.

When Alaric had left the room to put Mrs. Carlingford into her carriage, Theda stooped and picked up the manuscript of her little poem, which he had dropped upon the floor, and was too much occupied with the fair visitor to observe it.

"Why did I write this?" cried the crushed heart of the girl. "Is it a prophesy?" And she read the concluding verses with a bitter heart.

"But my whole life seemed as the swift years rolled,
More hollow and vain to be
Fame's bosom, at best, is hard and cold.
And I would have given all praise and gold
For the heart that was breaking for me—
Poor heart!
Thanklessly breaking for me.

"Sick with loneliness, and fears and dread,
I hurried across the sea.
'She had wasted as though with grief,' they said.
'Poor child! poor child! and was long since dead.'
Ah! she died for the love of me—
Poor heart!
Broken so vainly for me.

"Weighed down by a load too heavy to hold,
She had died unmurmuringly:
And I, remorseful and unconsoled,
I dreamed of the wasted days of old,
And the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Broken, and vainly, for me.

"And my soul cries out, in its bitter pain,
For the bliss that can never be,
For the love that can never come again,
For the sweet young life that had lived in vain,
And the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Dead—and buried—for me!"

As Theda Grey read the words which she had written, a look of resolution settled down over her face.

"I will not die for any man's love," she said, decisively. "I have portrayed a weak-minded heroine in my first attempt at verse writing. I will live—and live for my art as well as he! Let Alaric Langley go to Europe and become a great artist. I will stay at home and be a poet!"

She kept her word, for the poetic germ was there, and needed only cultivation. Alaric sailed with his artist friends for Italy.

Theda held his hands and kissed his lips at parting, but when he asked her to wait for him, she would make no promise.

"Remember the poem," she said, softly.

His face flushed.

"You wrong me bitterly if you imagine me that cold and heartless!" he cried, indignantly.

And so they parted.

Time went by. The name of Theda Grey was becoming a household word. Her poems, so sweet and tender and pathetic, comforted many a sorrowing soul.

For herself, she had simply swept love aside, and within her inmost heart, ambition reigned instead.

A year went by. Alaric was fast becoming famous. But he was living a wild sort of life among dissipated artists, and slowly but surely he began to yield to temptation. Gradually he descended. After the first downward step, man goes with a rush into Avernus. Five years did the work for him; five years sufficed to wreck his constitution and to ruin his fame. Then, one day, he woke to a realization of the truth. He was in despair.

What a harvest of tares I have sown!" he exclaimed, bitterly. "And my crop remains to be gathered. I will go home and turn over a new leaf. Even the prodigal of old was allowed a chance to retrieve his past. I will go back to mother and—and Theda. Dear, gentle little Theda! 'The heart that was breaking for me.' I remember it all. Heaven bless her. She will forgive me and take me back. With Theda for my wife, I will be strong once more to fight the world's battle!"

He sailed for home that very day. Alas! Where were the laurels he confidently expected to lay at Theda's feet when he had tired of the wild, fast life of the studio and saloon?

A worn, weary man, pale and haggard, with the marks of dissipation upon his once handsome safe, Alaric Langley entered her presence once more.

She looked like a tall, white lily in her clinging gown of snowy cashmere. A look of peace had found its way into the calm eyes, no longer troubled now. For Theda Grey no longer loved. She had killed all that, and she was wedded to her art. And so she told him, gently but firmly, while he knelt at her feet weeping, praying, beseeching her to give him once more the old, sweet love and trust.

"I cannot. It is impossible," she repeated. In answer to his beseeching—his mad imploring. "I said that I would live without love since it alone has caused all the sorrow of my life. I swore to be strong and brave. I swore that I would be no soft-hearted woman to die for the affection that was denied me. I loved you, Alaric, with all my heart and soul. You were my king—in my eyes a demi-god. But your coldness and selfishness killed all that, and I do not love you now. I can never love any man—never on earth!"

He arose and left her. He went back to his studio and a hard life of toil, determined to retrieve his past.

And she—she says that she is happy in her lonely life—her busy work. But Fame's bosom at best, is hard and cold. And a woman cannot stifle the voice of love until she has first crucified her heart.

Apples and Plums.

In the sixteenth century there was a curious enactment in England whereby street-hawkers were forbidden to sell plums and apples, for the reason that servants and apprentices were unable to resist the sight of them, and were consequently tempted to steal their employers' money in order to enjoy the costly delicacies.

Breakfast in 10 Minutes.

That means a good deal when you're in a hurry.

Well! a hot, palatable and wholesome meal can be furnished in that time when

Aunt Jemima's Pancake Flour

is used. Self-rising and ready for immediate use. Made from Wheat, Corn and Rice—the three great staffs of life. Guaranteed absolutely pure. Awarded First Premiums at World's Fair. Ask your grocer for it. If he insists it will him all the leading wholesale grocers sell it. R. T. DAVIS MILL CO., St. Joseph, Mo.
