R. T. DAVIS MILL CO., St. Joseph, Mo.

IT was too dark for him to work in the middle room where the fire was, and the other rooms were so cold that his fingers grew numb and dropped the brushes. He made numerous futile attempts to warm his hands at the grate and rush off to paint while the warmth lasted, but these were slow, discouraging results. Being an artist was far from a joy-producing condition under the existing circumstances, he reflected. He wanted to finish the picture he was doing—a mere something which would contribute to keep the kettle simmering while he awaited developments in other directions—but somehow the task was not easy. His friend Pratt had been more than kind to house him gratis so many weeks, but Pratt was only a clerk inhabiting a cheap apartment from which he was absent all day, and it was too bad imposing on his good nature. Weatherly, as dusk came on, felt that terrifying sense of desperation that comes over all ambitious young artists when they have to confess themselves defeated by inertia or lack of inspiration or even unpropitious surroundings. Recurring on this latest occasion it sickened him almost beyond endurance. He put away his brushes with a savage movement and threw himself down in a rocking chair before Pratt's pleasant fire. Moodily regarding the fitful flame he asked himself if it were not folly to continue the struggle.

But now? Well, he wished that he had never left the tropics to come North for the great exposition. What had he gained by coming? A little more knowledge of art—and of misery. What had he achieved? Tied hand and foot by lack of money; frozen in body and stagnant in mind; his ideas dulled, his inspiration dead.

A door opened and shut; a voice, common-place and contented, aroused him.

"Ha, old man! Getting warmed up? I tell you this is dandy weather—for the coal barons. Guess my ears are frozen, after all. Say, what do you think has happened? They'll be calling 'extras' all night. Why, a crank has shot the governor. In broad daylight—getting out of his carriage on a public street.

Weatherly started, with a choked cry. "The governor! My God! Is he—dead?"

"Died instantly."

The artist groaned, got up and walked into the next room, came back and groaned again. "I wanted to call on him; I wanted to talk to him on a subject of immigration restrictions. I had some suggestions to offer him; I know he would have listened—they were about diverting the immigrants off to the tropics—now it is too late!"

"Too bad," said Pratt, in a final way. "I tell you this fire feels good.

A GUANT APPARITION.

I'm glad to get home to it. Been doing a lot on that picture to-day, Clyde?"

Weatherly looked at him unseeingly.

"Anything wrong?" asked the clerk, stretching his long limbs comfortably and throwing back his blond, neat head.

In a mirror across the room the artist caught sight of his own contrasting dishevelled black locks and hollow eyes in a clear-cut, melancholy face.

"No," he answered, slowly. "Nothing wrong. Things move slowly in my line—that's all. There are a great many hinderances. Had a bad sort of light to-day and I didn't get on very fast. I'll make up to-morrow—I'll work on those pen and ink drawings."

Pratt laughed lazily in the firelight.

"That's right. Never saw a fellow who had more irons in the fire. You'll strike luck one of these days. Rich, too."

"I hope so. Did you have your dinner, or shall I go out to buy the things? I think I'd like a little outdoor run."

"No, I haven't dined. I brought a parcel, but we really need some coffee. I'm afraid you'll find it pretty bitter outside."

"It won't hurt me."

He hardly minded the air that stung his forehead and numbed his other features as he hurried over to the street where the stores were. The loud cries of the newsboys rang jarringly in his ears.

Assassinated! The great and liberal-minded governor shot down? Was there none to interpose? Why had not some one been there to strike aside the murderous hand? He would have done it—he, if only fate had written that he should be at the spot. Like an electric fantasy the scene flashed through his brain and was beheld by his soul's eyes. The distinguished man stepping from his carriage with perhaps a single attendant; the assassin at one side, silent, betraying no purpose; then suddenly the quiet drawing of the weapon, the deliberate aim—but even at that moment the darting movement forward of another human shape, that flings itself upon the assassin, and wrenches and scuffles with him to the earth. In the terrible struggle of those few seconds the discharging of the deadly weapon, but, thank God, only into empty air! Voices and faces closing excitedly around in an impenetrable wall; shouts of courage and splendid presence of mind: the word hero! It was the chance of a life—for fame and friends!

Clyde Weatherly stood in the small grocery, gazing vacantly at the white-aproned clerks. Perspiration was starting from every pore. He had dropped back to earth from a momentary heaven of imagination. The chance of his life had not yet come to him.

"A pound of your best coffee," he said, faintly, "and you may grind it, if you please."

* * * * *

A fortnight had passed. The young artist seemed to walk in a dream. The cold had lessened, and by day he went constantly about the streets. The picture on the easel had been hurriedly finished; he had not begun another, but worked only at his pen and ink drawings by gaslight through the long evenings. To his friend Pratt he appeared moody and queer.

The clerk at length questioned him.

"I say, old fellow, anything serious occurred? You don't seem quite your self."

Weatherly looked at him with bloodshot eyes.

"I am waiting for something—the chance of my life. It comes to every human; it's got to come to me. If it doesn't come between now and the New Year I'll give up. I won't wait any longer."

Pratt looked puzzled, but said no more.

But the artist went on walking the streets. It was not utterly new—the fantastic desire, the frenzy of expectation. From early youth he had dreamed vague dreams of distinguishing himself, of leaping to sudden glory by a single unhesitating, heroic deed. Down there in the tropics it had come to him at odd moments in cloudless afternoons, when he had sought to catch the tint of the enchanting mountains' haze and fix it on his canvas. Perhaps it had even lurked among the plans that had led him back to the North. But never with anything like the definiteness of now. For now it was no longer the pale phantom of a desire, but rather a something certain in the near future. The chance of his life would soon arrive. And thus it was he walked the streets in the bitter December weather, hollow-eyed, gaunt, with serious, almost frowning brow, but ever alert of bearing. Waiting, watching!

The clerk's curiosity was a grain too strong to be suppressed one morning when he saw the other breathing hard over a paragraph in the newspaper just brought in.

"What is it?" he asked, and Weatherly stammered some half-coherent reply about "danger" and "protection." Later on Pratt was surprised to find his friend had been exciting himself over the report that a well-known millionaire of this city had been visited by a stranger of seedy aspect—presumably a crank—who had declined to wait or state his business. Weatherly next started him by inquiring the nearest way to the house of the millionaire in question.

The last week of the year had slipped away—all but a single day. With his sons at home from school on their holiday vacation the millionaire was too well occupied to think of danger to himself. Nor had the servants' eyes for any forlorn figure in shabby overcoat passing and repassing in the avenue. It was a cold, dull day, there was not even snow.

Pratt had gone to the office with just a tinge of uneasiness in his mental condition. Weatherly had shown him a revolver the night before, newly purchased, it appeared.

And when he had ventured to ask what it meant, the artist had replied gravely that tramps and murderers were committing crimes everywhere and that no house seemed secure.

"What if he should mean suicide?" the good-hearted fellow asked himself. "He has grown so despondent. I'll coax him to put it aside to-night, when I have a chance."

It was past noon when the millionaire and his handsome sons came down the great stone steps of the mansion.

"It is going to snow, boys," said the father. "I am sorry we didn't have the carriage, after all. But we shall need umbrellas; go back for them."

He sauntered out toward the curb, turned and looked cityward down the avenue. Behind him, suddenly as if risen out of the frozen earth, a man approached. At the light footstep the millionaire faced about and stood stone-still. A gaunt apparition, with wild, unseeing eyes, for just the space of a second, leveled a pistol at his bosom. The next instant the apparition's other arm had clutched the one that held the revolver. The figure fought with itself! Both hands were at its own throat, choking itself, while a husky, despairing cry for "help" came from its lips. In another instant came a flash and a loud report. The struggling figure fell to the earth.

He was dead. In the struggle the pistol had been discharged. The chance of his life had come when Clyde Weatherly had gone mad to meet it.
