ARE you awake, Vera?"

"Yes! wide awake," is the answer, in very sleepy tones.

"It's time to start now. Mother and father have gone to bed. I heard him throw his boots out. Isn't it funny that he always makes such a noise with them?" continued Mary, who was rather given to thinking about everything.

"What are you doing now?" said matter-of-fact Vera, who was out of bed by this time.

"I'm going to dress."

"Nonsense! if we stop to dress we shall be caught. You know that mother says she often comes to look at us in the night. It's only just downstairs and across the lawn, and it's so hot we can't catch cold."

"But supposing we stamp on"—

"On what?" said Vera, impatiently collecting a small family of dolls from the two beds and handing them to Mary.

"On black beetles or slugs," said Mary, with a shudder.

"Oh! you are no fun at all," said Vera, haughtily; and, sitting down on the floor with her face in the moonlight, she took her younger sister to task. "Now, didn't you say you'd just love to go into the old farmhouse?"

Mary nodded, and cuddled the dolls up into her arms as if she wanted to comfort them and herself, too.

"And didn't you hear nurse say it was a dreadful place inside, and it was a pity some one didn't stop its falling to pieces? Of course you did; and we both said we would go over it to-night; and now that I have taken the trouble to keep awake all these hours, you don't want to go. I call it mean. When we get home again, I won't let you play with my doll's house, that I won't; and if mother says I may have the new dinner service, I'll do all the cooking myself, that I will."

Some time after, the little girls had crept down the stairs and were crossing the lawn by the light of the moon, Mary grasping the dolls with motherly care, and Vera holding a candlestick.

The door of the deserted farmhouse stood open as usual.

"Now, isn't this worth coming to see?" said Vera, standing on the top of the old oak staircase. She had lighted the candle, and held it so that they could look round. Mary admired the staircase, but something rushed across the floor near her bare feet and made her scream. Vera started, dropped the candlestick, and the light went out.

"How tiresome you are!" said Vera, crossly, stooping to pick it up. Just then the moon went behind a thick cloud, and the place was in darkness.

"Stand still, just a minute, dear," said Vera, gently, for Mary was crying; her own heart was beating fast, and she was already beginning to repent. "I must find the candle, then we will just make haste home again."

A MAN CAME DOWN THE STEPS.

She found the candle, after what seemed a very long time, and then she remembered that the matches had fallen, too. She crawled about, feeling all over the floor; then suddenly, when reaching out, her hand went into space, the floor seemed to give way, and she fell with a scream.

She didn't hurt herself, after all, beyond a severe shaking.

"Where are you, Mary?" she said, softly, when she had got to her feet again. No answer. How the child wished she was safe at home! If only the moon would come out, things would be better; as it was, she was standing somewhere, she knew not where, in total darkness, afraid to move a foot, lest she should fall again.

"Mary, Mary, dear!" she called, as loudly as she could. The empty walls caught up the echo, and seemed to say, "Here!" then the child lost her fear of discovery and punishment, and shrieked.

A moment afterwards a bright light flashed into her eyes, and a man, who to the terrified child looked like a giant, came down the steps which led into the room.

In an instant Vera saw where she was. She had fallen through the floor of one of the upper rooms to the kitchen below.

This takes a few minutes to tell you, but it did not take a second for Vera to think; it flashed through her mind like a streak of lightning, and before the man had got down the three stairs leading into the kitchen she had sprung into a cupboard which stood open.

"Now then!" said the man in a loud voice. "It's not a bit of use hiding. I've tried to find you often enough before, now I've got you as safe as nuts. Come along out and I'll teach you to scare the country for miles round. Come along I tell you, and I'll soon show the folks the ghost. Listen; they are waiting outside for you."

Vera, with every limb shaking, had hold of the cupboard door; there evidently were two in the room, for she heard the policeman bang a door in disgust when he found no one in it. She heard him walking toward her hiding place, his hand was on the door, and he had opened it just a crack, but had not had time to flash his bull's-eye lantern in, when there was a loud scream upstairs.

Constable Jones of the Shingleton police, which consisted of himself and a boy to run messages, let go of the cupboard and disappeared.

Vera watched him through the crack of the door, and determined to follow him. If he could get in, she could get out, she thought.

She found her way up the three steps that led into the wilderness which had once been a garden, and was standing wondering which way to turn, when she heard some one cry: "There it goes, catch it quick!"

Then she knew that there was a crowd standing outside the deserted farmhouse, and that they were chasing her. How she ran! Her little bare feet were pricked and torn, yet she ran on and on, till she caught her foot in something, and fell.

"Why, darling, you've tumbled out of bed again," said her mother's voice. "What were you dreaming about? Hush, hush! you will wake Mary."

"Oh, mother! where is she?" cried the terrified child, sobbing in her mother's arms.

"Fast asleep in bed, darling; but she is lying all topsy-turvy, and the dolls are all anyhow. What have you both been doing?"

"We wanted to go over to the farmhouse, mother, and we knew you would not let us, so we made up our minds to go to-night. I made Mary promise to wake me, and we both got out of bed to start; that's all I remember, but I expect we got into bed again, and fell asleep. But, mother, I have had such a dreadful dream!"

Then Vera told it all to her mother.

"It is a good thing you did not go, darling," said Mrs. Franklin, kindly. "Come to the window; I want to show you something."

Well might the child start back and cover her eyes with her hands; the old farmhouse was a heap of ruins; the roof had fallen in during the night.

"Mother, suppose we had been there?" said Vera, in dismay.

"Yes, dear, suppose you had?" answered her mother, gravely.

A Scotch Joke.

College boys are incorrigible practical jokers. A story comes to us from Scotland of an examiner at Edinburgh university who had made himself obnoxious by warning the students against putting their hats on his desk. The university in the Scottish capital is remarkable for a scarcity of cloak-rooms, and in the excitement of examinations hats are, or used to be, flung down anywhere. This examiner announced one day that if he found another hat on his desk he would rip it up. The next day no hats were laid there when the students assembled. Presently, however, the examiner was called out of the room. Then some wicked undergraduate slipped from his seat, got the examiner's own hat, and placed it on his desk. When the examiner re-entered the hall, every eye was fixed on him. He observed the hat, and a gleam of triumph shot across his face. "Gentlemen," he said, "I told you what would happen if this occurred again." Then he took his penknife from his pocket, opened it, and blandly cut the hat in pieces, amid prolonged applause.

What he said when he discovered that it was his own hat we are not told, but it is safe to say his remarks were interesting.—Harper's Young People.

Editorial Imagination in Georgia.

A Georgia weekly carries off the belt; it says: "Some time ago our baby's little finger ring was missing and could not be found. When last seen the child had it on and was feeding some chickens, but no trace of it could be found, and the subject was dismissed until yesterday, when one of our hens came off with a brood of chickens, and lo, and behold, around the neck of one of the tiny creatures was the baby's ring. Our presumption is that the hen swallowed the ring, but how on earth did it get on the little chick's neck?"

How to Keep the Grip Away.

All the doctors seem to agree in the opinion that the best way to protect oneself against an attack of the grip is to keep the general health as good as possible, to be careful not to catch cold, to live temperately, to breathe pure air, to avoid bad habits, and to take enough sleep. The grip is a painful, harassing, harmful and dangerous disease, affecting both the body and the mind.

Very Lucid.

A German under cross-examination as a witness was finally cornered by the oft-repeated question, "But what about the hitting and kicking of this officer?" to which he blustered out: "He ain't was hit at all nor kicked too."
