A FORTUNATE FAKE

LETTER—a reply—at last!

Wayne Gilbert dropped the architect's implements with which he had been drawing the plan of a many-storied apartment-house and snatched the envelope. A moment later he dropped it as if it had stung him, for his own writing stared up at him. The passionate letter he had written was returned to him with the seal unbroken.

"Well, this latest hint should be sufficient," he said, bitterly, to himself. "Only an idiot or a scoundrel would prosecute a girl with attentions after such an intimation."

He was not generally an idle fellow. His fellow-clerks felt frequently rebuked by his determined industry. But now he sat a long time with his hands gripping the arms of his chair, and his gaze fixed blankly on the opposite wall. He thought it all over; his love-story was not a long one. Three months previous he had met Vivien Van Roosevelt at the home of his cousin. He had straightway fallen headlong in love with the girl—with her stately dark beauty, her gentle manner, her delicious sense of humor, her voice, that was so mellowly fascinating. And he never once reminded himself—after the absurd fashion of men in love—that he was only an architect's clerk, and she "a lady of honor and wealth."

Of this fact the little blind god seemed also oblivious, or to it indifferent. For when Gilbert had said, boldly and yet tremblingly, "I love you, dear?" she lifted to his sweet eyes that were dim but illumined.

And she had pledged him her heart, hand, and womanly fealty.

But when he urged speaking to her guardian she had tremulously protested.

"He is a hard man, Wayne. I am not quite of age yet. Anthony Van Roosevelt has other plans for me. I must not at once let him know that that they can never be realized."

So they had continued to meet at the house of Mrs. French. Gilbert's cousin, until ten days ago. Then Vivien had failed to keep her appointment. She ignored the gifts he sent her, the flowers, and books, and matinee tickets. He dared not go to the house himself, after her express command to the contrary. He asked Mrs. French to do so. She came back saying the message given to her was that Miss Van Roosevelt was engaged.

"It appears to me, Wayne," his cousin commented, in repeating the incident, "that Vivien had merely proffered an excuse for the sake of politely dropping our acquaintance."

He could not bear to hear another voice the dread that confronted him.

"She would never be guilty of such rudeness, Emily," he declared, and took himself away.

He wrote to her once, twice, a third time. To the first two letters no reply was returned. The third was sent back unopened.

Well the brief romance was ended now.

When Wayne was ready to leave the office, he went to the door of the private office and knocked.

"Come in," called a deep voice.

Mr. Mason, the senior member of the firm, glanced up pleasantly at the young man, whom personally he liked, and professionally was fast learning to respect.

"I wish to tender my resignation, Mr. Mason—I am going away."

"To leave the city?"

"Yes, sir."

"I am sorry to hear this. Is there

"LET ME ASSIST YOU."

any reason in the office for your resolution?"

"None, sir. My relations with all here have been very pleasant. The motive that influences me is purely personal."

"When do you wish your resignation to take effect?"

"As soon as you find it convenient."

Ten minutes later he was walking, moody and dispirited, through the city streets. Only those who found it necessary to do so would venture abroad that evening, one fancied. The heavy snow of a few days previous had turned to slush, and this the severe and sudden cold had transformed to rough, slippery ice. An easterly wind, filled with particles of a fine, stinging sleet, was blowing.

The day had darkened down, and street lamps were gleaming out points of gold in the gloom when Wayne Gilbert found himself before the palatial home of Anthony Van Roosevelt. The lower floor was brightly lighted. One blind that remained undrawn permitted the watcher to see into the dining-room. A servant was moving around placing the dinner on the table which was snowily covered and sparkling with cut glass and silver.

"It is no wonder," said the man on the sidewalk, to himself, looking in with hot, angry eyes, "that she, accustomed to such luxury, repented her rash promise to me."

He waited on, longing to see her enter the room, even if the sight set his heart aching more sharply. The door opened. An old gentleman, Anthony Van Roosevelt, entered. Then followed a man of small stature, weazened of feature, prematurely old. Undoubtedly he was the son of the master of the house, of whom he had heard Vivien speak. But although Gilbert waited, weary, haggard, and half frozen, until the two men had finished their meal, Vivien did not appear.

He had given up his absurd hope, and was turning away, with a groan, when the hall door opened and Oscar Van Roosevelt came out. Wayne walked on—he was on the opposite pavement. Suddenly he heard a fall, a curse. He ran across the street. The young man, who had just emerged from Van Roosevelt's, was prone on his back.

"Let me assist you," Gilbert said.

He took the other by the arm, lifted him, as he would have lifted a child. At the same instant he noticed that several letters, which the unlucky pedestrian had been carrying, lay scattered on the sidewalk. He picked them up, with the intention of restoring them. He handed back four. The fifth he retained, for the light from a lamp on the corner showed him that it was addressed to him, in a pretty English hand:

"Mr. Wayne Gilbert"

His mind one queer blurr and confusion, conscious only that the letter belonged to him, and that possibly there was treachery afloat, he slipped the envelope into his pocket. With a muttered word of thanks, young Van Roosevelt took the letters extended, brushed the sleeve of his coat, and hurried away, walking, however, with more caution. Under the street lamp Gilbert opened his envelope. He read:

"This is the last letter dear Wayne that I shall write to you. I cannot understand why it is I have received no word or message from you since my lines. This is my third note. The others I gave the housekeeper to post. Perhaps she blundered. This I shall intrust to my cousin, Oscar Van Roosevelt. If I do not hear from you in answer I will conclude that we have said farewell. VIVIEN VAN ROOSEVELT."

Gilbert walked straight back to the house he had lately been staring at, went up the steps, and rang the bell.

"I wish to see Miss Van Roosevelt," he said to the servant who appeared.

"Your name, please?"

He heard, distinctly, a soft voice in a room on the right, saying:

"Who—who is that, Uncle Anthony?"

Then the door was abruptly closed.

"Gilbert," the caller said to the servant. "Mr. Wayne Gilbert."

"Miss Van Roosevelt," the girl said, hastily, "is not at home."

"That," declared Gilbert, in his quietest tone, "is not true."

He pushed past the girl, walked to the door on the right, opened it, and went in.

Anthony Van Roosevelt straightened up in his chair at sight of the intruder, and a slender, girlish figure, lounging among silken pillows on a low couch, started erect, and held her hands out to him with a little happy cry.

Then he was standing beside her, the thin hands held tight in his.

"I only this hour got your last letter," he said. "It fell from the pocket of a man who had just left this house. It is dated four days ago. I have written you repeatedly. I have sent you messages and gifts."

Vivien looked at her guardian. She was as white as her gown. She rose, steadily.

"I understand," she said, quietly. "Your insistence that I should marry your son is now explained. You and he have been in league against me, and against my lover. Even the servants you have bribed to treachery. My heaven! how nearly you succeeded!"

The old man hung his head.

In fact of all the evidence that could be adducted, he knew denial would be vain.

The girl rang the bell.

"Order the carriage," she said to the servant. "Tell Rosette to pack my clothes and jewelry at once, then to bring my wraps to me here."

Then she turned to Wayne.

"I am strong enough to leave the house now; but I have been very ill. I shall go to the home of my aunt."

"Until you will come to your own, darling," he whispered.

Two months later she became of age, and her large fortune was at her disposal. Her guardian and his scheming son glowered over the paper, in which they read the notice of her marriage. But at that time Mr. and Mrs. Wayne Gilbert, speeding South on their wedding trip to the land of the magnolia and olive, were laughing over the occurrence which led to their reunion.

"That fall of your cousin's was a fortunate one," averred Gilbert.

"Fortunate?" echoed his pretty bride.

He gave a gay, positive nod.

"Yes—for me."

Next Morning.

The Family Cat, surveying his reflection in the family water bucket—One ear gone, one eye closed, thirteen gashes, part of the lower jaw missing, and nothing left of the whiskers but stumps. What a glorious old time I must have had last night.

This Is a Pleasant Game.

A popular amusement in society circles now is for a young man to wager with a pretty girl that her sleeve is larger around than her waist, and then proceed to measure with his arm.

*Boxes north of river.

Fire alarms are sounded upon the tower bell at department headquarters by striking the number of the signal station nearest the fire, in this manner. If for box 4, four distinct strokes and repeated; if for box 13, one stroke, a short pause, then three strokes and repeated, thus, 1-111, 1-111, etc. "2-2" is sounded for all fires within the district bounded by Fifth, Ninth, Jackson and Quincy streets.

THE STROKES, thus repeated, followed by the number of the signal station nearest the fire, is the SECOND ALARM—for a serious fire.

THREE STROKES, followed by TWELVE, and repeated, is the GENERAL ALARM for a very dangerous fire, and calls out the entire department with a full roll of apparatus.

TWO STROKES, slowly, indicates FIRE IS OUT.

One long whistle from water works, for fires south of river. Three whistles from same, for fires north of river.
