Catarrh
AND
COLD IN THE HEAD
relieved instantly by one application of Birney's Catarrh Powder

REV. FATHER CLARKE, writes from the Rt. Rev. Bishop of Columbus, Ohio, writes:

Gentlemen: I cannot say too much for your Powder. It has proved to me a most wonderful remedy. Many times I have had to stop in the pulpit because I could not breathe, my nostrils being so stuffed with catarrh. I put a little of your Powder on my handkerchief and in a few minutes could breathe freely through the nostril under treatment. I will do more than I have promised in your behalf when I say I believe your Powder to be a good, safe and reliable remedy. Yours truly,

M. E. FERRETT, Chaplain U. S. Acquidneck Shops, Cleveland, Ohio.

Gentlemen: Some seven years ago I was so deaf as to be almost stone deaf, and getting no better from many remedies which I had used, was induced to try your Catarrh Powder. The result was astonishing. I can now hear perfectly in that ear. I have recommended it to many others with the same results. Yours truly,

SHUT THE PUBLIC OUT.

Pollard-Breckinridge Case Conducted With Only Lawyers Present.

WASHINGTON, March 24.—Judge Bradley executed a bit of strategy on the newspaper men who had gathered today to hear the arguments over the admissibility of certain depositions taken for the defense in the Pollard-Breckinridge case.

Just before the hour for court to open a whisper passed among the lawyers and they slipped one by one into the judge's consultation room, adjoining the court room. A uniformed bailiff standing at the door denied admission to all but the legal forces, Col. Breckinridge and his son. The party was closeted in the judge's room two hours.

There are three depositions to which Miss Pollard's attorneys make their principal objections, the point involved being the relevancy of the testimony bearing upon Miss Pollard's character.

One of these depositions was made by Alic Julian, the young blind man whom Miss Pollard alluded to in her letter as "Wessie" Brown as her "Blind Barnabas." He asserts in the affidavit taken in Kentucky that a mock marriage was performed between Miss Pollard and himself at 'Squire Tinsley's at Bridgeport, on Christmas day, 1883, and after drinking eggnog freely, he suggested that married couples usually went to bed; and thereupon the two went up stairs and got in bed together.

Miss Pollard testified on cross-examination that her uncle accompanied her to 'Squire Tinsleys on that day, and denied the incident of the mock marriage.

The reason for a secret hearing regarding these depositions is to keep their contents from the jury in the case the court decides upon excluding them. Although the jurors have been cautioned to not talk with anyone concerning the case, nor to read the newspapers, the judge probably thinks that the head lines of newspapers would be too much for human curiosity to resist if spread before them Sunday morning.

TO WEIGH THE GOLD.

Superintendent of Mint Won't Retire Till Everything Is Found Straight.

PHILADELPHIA, March 24.—Dr. Eugene Townsend, the new superintendent of the Philadelphia mint, will probably not enter upon the duties of his office before July 1, although the treasury department is desirous that he should succeed Col. O. H. Bosbyshell on April 2.

When Col. Bosbyshell assumed charge of the mint he followed an established precedent and gave a receipt in full for the contents of the two sealed vaults without asking an accounting.

When the stealings of Chief Weigher Cochrane were discovered, he was criticised for not having the contents weighed, hence he wants everything accounted for before he leaves, which will take several months.

WHIRLING SNOW

All Over the Far Northern States—The Storm Is a Blizzard.

ST. PAUL, Minn., March 24.—Specials to the Dispatch from various parts of the northwest tell of another severe storm nearly approaching the blizzard in its proportions.

Duluth calls it the worst blizzard of the winter, and fears much damage unless the storm subsides quickly.

The storm rages fiercely all along the lake and business is much interfered with. Washburn, Wis., reports a fall of one foot of snow and still falling.

Throughout the Dakotas the storm rages and is extended all over Minnesota. In some sections there is little snow, but the high winds are general.

A LOONEY GIRL

Causes Great Excitement and Fright in the Woman's Temple.

CHICAGO, March 24.—Elizabeth Davis, an 18 year-old girl, created considerable excitement last night in the Woman's Temple building by demanding to see the murderer of Mayor Harrison. She was laboring under an insane delusion that Prendergast was confined somewhere in the building and she wanted to talk with him about his case.

The girl's wild actions badly scared the occupants of the many offices, she announcing that she was in sympathy with Prendergast. She was finally locked up by the police and will be examined for insanity.

ONE MORE TRUST.

The Paper Manufacturers Seek to Form a New Combination.

BOSTON, March 24.—It is stated on the authority of a prominent Boston paper manufacturer that a movement is on foot to form a combination of the paper manufacturers of the country with a view to raising prices and controlling the market.

The idea originated with New York manufacturers and nearly all the large manufacturers of the east have agreed to enter the trust. Several meetings have been held and plans outlined.

CRIMINAL NOT CRANK.

The Man Who Shot Cashier Herrick Has a Bad Record.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 24.—William Fredericks, who shot Cashier Herrick is only 22 years old, but for years has been a hardened criminal. Several years ago he was sent to the penitentiary for robbery, and served four years. He is accused of two murders besides that of Herrick, and is suspected of another.

Last night he admitted that his name was Fredericks, and said that he had furnished arms to George Sontag, Chris Evans' partner when Sontag tried to escape from Folsom prison.

"IT'S hard work pleasing you, Harvey Langford. I gave up the attempt long ago," said Ina Barlow, with a shrug of the shoulders.

They were pretty shoulders, white and dimpled, gleaming from under the dainty muslin dress; but the shrug was undeniable, and followed up by a toss of the head and a pout of the red lips.

"I should not suppose one could judge of the difficulty attending an untried task," retorted the young man. "You know well enough what would please me, Ina, and you are so fully aware that you constantly pursue the opposite path. Will Strong and Joe Dering are good enough fellows in their way; but for all that, you need not reserve all your smiles for them. Let them know how matters stand between us—"

"And how is that?" interrupted the girl, with a quick flash of her eye.

"Ina, didn't you give me your promise a month ago? And the young man's honest brown eyes looked steadfly into hers.

"I told you when you got to be overseer at the mines I would think about it. There's plenty of time between now and then for me to change my mind—if, indeed, it has ever been made up. At all events, frowns and fault-findings won't make me any the more eager for the day to arrive."

"Ah, darling, when that hour comes, the frowns will have been chased away forever. Come, dear, tell me if you love me just a little. Perhaps I am unreasonable, but I can't help it, Ina. When I see you with other men, and you seem so cold and indifferent to me, I feel as though I could kill them and snatch you away where no eye but mine could dwell on your beauty. There, dear, I must leave you. Say good-night, and give me a corner in your dreams."

The girl's eyes had softened now. The bright, young mouth quivered, and the full, red lips were raised to meet the warm, glowing kiss her lover left upon them.

"I do love you, Harvey," she whispered, "if you would only not be so cross."

"I know it, dear," he answered.

And gathering her in his arms, as though she had been a feather, he pressed another kiss upon the chestnut-crowned head, and then went out into the night.

Though but a rustic beauty, whose views of life were bounded by the village horizon, she had grown up a willful, petted thing, with her feet as carefully guarded from the rough paths as any high-born lady in the land.

Another month rolled by, and Harvey Langford spent his days in a strange alternation of joyful hope and jealous anger, though latterly the former was slowly dying out. Ina began to treat him with suspicious coldness. She no longer bore allusion to the fulfillment of her promise, and her smiles grew more frequent to others as they lessened to him. He was pacing up the long lane leading to her door on one fine October afternoon, revolving many bitter thoughts and determining to make to Ina one last appeal, when, turning a bend in the road, he saw two figures a short distance ahead. There was no mistaking the straight young figure, with the pretty hat coquettishly placed upon the night-curls; but the man's heart beat thick and fast, as in the tall, manly form at her side he recognized Will Strong.

No wonder she had grown cold and hard, when she held secret meetings with this man. He could hear no spoken word between them, but he saw that the girl's head was bent low, one little foot tapping the dust and her ungloved hand clasped within those of her companion. He was talking low and earnestly, and when she answered the air of coquetry always with her had disappeared. Her manner was as grave as his own. He could almost see the crimson flush upon her cheek, for her head was raised now, and she was speaking in low, rapid tones. Then she ceased, and Harvey Langford's face grew white with the pallor almost of death, and from his eyes shone a fierce flame, as he watched the man before him bend and kiss the lips turned to him, then turn and hasten in the opposite direction.

A few quick imperious strides brought him to her side. Her head was turned from him, her face buried in her hands; then she felt his grasp upon her arm, and, looking up, saw in the stern, pale face before her that he had seen all.

"Parting from your lover, were you? For how long—twenty-four hours? A pity any one should have witnessed the tender scene! Child! Woman! Devil! What are you and what have you done this day?"

"Nothing that I have cause to blush for;" and the face raised to his was pale as his own; the eyes flamed with an answering flash. "If you had come to me like a man, Harvey Langford, I could have told you all you want to know, but you came instead to spy upon my actions and you have received a spy's reward. From this moment you have lost the right to question or I to answer. I have made a narrow escape from the jealous meshes in which you would have bound me but the toils are broken. I am free, and so are you."

"I am not the first man who hugs a serpent only to feel its sting. God pity the man who takes your fair face and your false heart to sit beside his hearthstone. Heaven help me! I plucked the opening blossoms, only to find that I had gathered Dead sea fruit. Were you to come to me to-morrow a suppliant for the place I once so proudly offered, I would spurn you as now!" and shaking off his grasp from her arm with one look of bitterest contempt, he left her where he had found her.

"Harvey! Harvey!" she cried out at last; but his figure was far away, his ears deaf to her appeal, and like a wounded bird she sank upon the ground.

The dull November days were drawing to a close, the trees were stripped of their beautiful foliage which so lately had adorned them, the earth lay cold and bare, waiting for its snowy mantle, when, on a gray, chill morning, a low rumbling sound in the vicinity of the mines caused men to look at one another in anxious dread, which at last found vent in the awful cry:

"The mine's on fire!"

"The wall will soon fall in!" "Some one must go to the rescue!" said a voice.

Then Harvey Langford stepped forward.

"Harvey," whispered a voice in his ear; and falling back a step he turned to see the fair beauty of the girl he had once so madly loved.

"Well, what do you want?" he questioned roughly. "To look once more upon your work ere I go to my doom?"

"No, Harvey," the sweet, young voice faltered; "to beg you, for my sake, not to go. I have suffered so, Harvey. Let me tell you how. It was not as you supposed. Will Strong had asked me to marry him, and I—I had told him I could not, because—because of my love for you; and when I said that, he told me you were a good, brave fellow, and since I could not care for him, he only hoped I might be happy; and then, Harvey, he begged me just to give him one kiss to take with him into his new life, and so I—"

"Have it—yes, I saw it all. A well-told story, Ina Barlow—a story you may whisper in my dead ears when they bring, an hour hence, perhaps, my lifeless body from the mine." And, with a harsh laugh, he pushed away the little hand held so pleadingly on his arm. "Stand back, men; I am ready." And in another moment the descending shaft hid him from their sight.

Minutes passed, which to those waiting seemed endless hours. The smoke came up in thick, hot gusts, and an awful silence fell upon all.

"The old shaft!" at last exclaimed a voice. "Could one enter by that, he could go below and warn the men which way safety lay."

But the opening was so small, a child only could effect a passage, and in what childish heart lay the heroism which should nerve it to face such dangers? Into Ina Barlow's pale face came a gleam of color, one glance at the slight figure, one prayer upon the pure lips and she stood forward.

"Take me!" she simply said. "I go to save the man I love."

In her eyes shone a dauntless courage, and no man dared say her "nay." But when she had at last gone into that awful chasm, which seemed to swallow up all in its vast yawning mouth, a groan burst from the lips of those present—a groan, followed by a cheer, as Harvey Langford's form appeared again in sight and one by one the miners followed. In that fearful peril which he had but just escaped, a sweet young voice seemed to echo in his ear, a dim wonderment to pierce his brain as to whether its ring of truth were real, a wild desire to look again upon her face and read therein the secret; but in vain he searched to find her beauty. The chestnut-crowned head was nowhere to be seen, when, in rough whispers, from mouth to mouth passed the knowledge of her deed and his quick ear caught it.

"Cowards!" burst from his white lips. "You would let a woman do this thing!"

"She said she went to save the man she loved," spoke one.

And in Harvey Langford's eyes there shone such joy as if the misery there written, while on his lips arose a wild prayer, as once again he plunged from their sight, lying where she had fallen, like a lily blown from its stem, white and senseless, he picked her up and bore her to the shaft. Many strong arms came to the rescue; but the cheers fell on dull, listless ears, and for a while they thought death had claimed them both. But life held too much promise, and when, scarcely three months later, the new overseer of the mines claimed his bride, distrust had vanished from both their hearts; and, while kind and cheering wishes fell like hail upon them, in Harvey Langford's simple, quiet words, "My wife!" as they stood upon the threshold of their new home, sounded the thanksgiving of a life.

WHAT THEY SAY.

The Representatives Talk About Coxey's Army.

WASHINGTON, March 24.—One member expresses confidence that no opposition will be offered to the progress of the crusade along its march, and also feels certain that congress will pass the two Coxey bills as soon as the army heaves in sight.

One of the bills is for an issue of $500,000,000 of fiat money, the other for giving work to the unemployed by building roads. Col. Bedstone sees no constitutional difficulties in the fact that the roads are under control of the states or counties.

Members of congress are watching the assembling of the Coxey army which is to descend upon them, with mingled astonishment and amusement. Most of them regard the army as an absurdity which will soon melt away. Some few attach to it a profound significance as an indication of a popular uprising which is to shake the foundation stones of a Democratic government. No thought has been given to its suppression. A number of congressmen know Coxey personally and credit him with cleverness and business ability.

Representative Sibley of Pennsylvania and other members who like good horses, have known Coxey at stock meetings, as he has a fondness for high bred horses.

Representative Ikle, of Ohio, within whose district the Coxey army is organizing, knows nothing of him.

Representative Dalzell and other Pittsburgers say that Coxey does a flourishing sand business at Pittsburg, though they do not know him personally. Concerning the march of the army on the capital, a number of congressmen were interviewed today:

Representative Bland said: "It is an indication of the unrest and uncertainty of the people. The Coxey army has as much right to come to Washington as the lobbyists who come in behalf of protection and other private business.

"As long as they pay their expenses and commit no depredation, they have a perfect right to come. But if they violate law and become a mob of pillagers, they should be suppressed."

Representative Outhwaite, (Dem., O.): "If Coxey's followers will only think, they will see that if from 10,000 to 50,000 men can intimidate congress to do one thing, then another 10,000 to 50,000 can intimidate it to do another thing, which leads to anarchy."

Representative Hopkins, (Rep.): "My judgment of Coxey's army is it will never materialize. It is so perfectly absurd that I can not conceive how any number of men can be gotten together for such a purpose."

Representative Hitt (Rep., Ill.): "The wisdom of having the national capital at a small city is shown by the Coxey movement. If the capital were at New York or Chicago these movements would be frequent. Paris has been in the hands of Coxeys three times."

Representative Dalzell (Rep., Pa.): "Notoriety is at the bottom of it, and it would have fallen long ago if it had not been heralded in the press. It will fall of its own weight."

Representative Meiann (Rep.): "There appears to be doubt as to what the purpose of the movement will be. A Chicago leader in it says he is coming to insist that Indians shall not be confined to reservations. Coxey's purpose appears to be to have the government build roads and thus give work to the unemployed. It is noticeable that organized labor is not identified with this movement. Organized labor has confidence in its own ability to ultimately secure a fair share of the wealth it creates, which is all they ask, and that the government shall not extort it from them by excessive tax on the necessaries of life."

Representative Wheeler (Dem., Ala.): "The movement will probably die out before the army reaches Washington and nothing will be accomplished."

Representative Broderick (Rep., Kan.): "I have not taken the Coxey movement seriously. Men having intelligence and regard for the public good could not be induced to take part in such a considerable number as to make the movement formidable. In any event, nothing could be accomplished by such an appeal to congress."

SORROW IS DEEP.

Medical College Students Can't Bring Their Girls to the Banquet.

There is sorrow this Easter eve in the hearts of the students of the Kansas Medical college. The faculty has arranged for a banquet after the commencement next Wednesday night and the students went on the supposition that they might invite their young lady friends. Today, however, the faculty made a ruling that "only students need apply." Escorts don't go.

Several of the students had already asked their girls to accompany them, and they are trying to devise means to square themselves. In one case a young lady is having a new dress made especially for the occasion. The young man who was to take her is hoping the world will come to an end before Wednesday.
