 That Old Friend.
 A certain New York millionaire clubman, famous for his dinners and sayings, is just now relating a good story against himself. He has recently returned from a year's absence abroad and has naturally forgotten a few names, placing those he remembers, as a rule, on the wrong person, so that his attempts at hearty recognition have been somewhat dangerous, yet amusing.
 He was going down Fifth avenue the other day when he caught sight of a figure which in the distance he seemed to recall. Increasing his somewhat measured walk, he presently passed the man and then retraced his steps.
 A glance at his face was sufficient. He knew him and recollected as he advanced toward him a cozy little dinner by the window in the club dining room, where he had listened so attentively to the stories with which the man now before him had deluged the conversation.
 The stranger looked up as, "Why, my dear fellow, I'm very glad to see you," fell upon his ears.
 A look of keen humor lighted up his eyes as he clasped, apparently reluctantly, the speaker's extended hand.
 "You are very kind," he murmured, "very kind, sir."
 "Why, what nonsense! Here, I'm just going to lunch at Delmonico's. You must come with me and tell me some more of your French stories."
 "Stories! What stories?" gasped his old friend.
 "Don't you remember that dinner on the night before my departure? Why, you simply reeled them off."
 "Oh, yes! I served that well, eh?" he replied, with a slowness that portended a double entendre.
 At that moment the porch of Delmonico's was reached, and in they turned.
 An hour was passed over a delightful lunch whereat the multimillionaire related anecdotes of his year's travel.
 The bill had just been presented and accepted as he said:
 "I'm devilish sorry, you know, but I'm awfully bad at names. I've quite forgotten yours. I am Jack — of C — club."
 "And I," responded his guest, "I'm Jennings, the C — club's steward."—New York Herald.

MIDSEASON'S WRAPS

[Special Correspondence.]
 New York, Sept. 20.—The present occupation of the female mind is what kind of a midseason wrap to get. It is useless to get an expensive one unless the fair wearer can afford to throw her money away, for at the utmost she can not wear it over eight weeks, but it is something she must have. A novel wrap for that purpose is made of black faille, cut like a stole, but with tabs coming 15 inches below the waist and cut chisel fashion at the bottom. It is slightly gathered at the waist line under a chou of silk. It is lined all through with changeable taffeta, light blue and gold. There is a deep fall of black lace on each shoulder, and bretelles of silk arranged in a novel manner by folding the fullness over instead of letting it ripple. This shows the lining. The whole wrap is bordered with narrow passementerie. The collar is made by plaiting the silk, and there is another chou at the throat. It comes to a plain point in the back, and the bretelles end there under another chou. This is a very pretty wrap and can be easily made at home. It requires two yards of silk and the same amount for lining. The lace falls could be omitted. The narrow passementerie costs 10 cents a yard. In cutting it the pieces that come out of the sides make the bretelles. Almost every one has a piece of black silk, perhaps a breadth out of an old dress. In this case it should be, if not fresh, laid flat upon a table and rubbed smartly with a piece of flannel wet with arrachine or, failing that, equal parts of cider vinegar and water. When well rubbed and quite wet, hang it in the shade to dry without wringing or ironing, and when dry it will look like new and be just as firm.
 Another very pretty demisaison is made of a wide collar of white lace, laid over silk of some color, though black is handsomer. Around the neck is a standing frill of ribbon, and all the way around at equal distances are loops of the same ribbon which reach to the edge of the collar, leaving two fish tail ends in front. This can be worn with woolen dresses as well as silk ones and makes a very dressy addition.
 Many ladies find it difficult to get up vests and dress fronts for themselves, and think it a difficult thing to do so. A neat vest is made by taking a width of china silk, sufficient to give the requisite fullness in front, and shirring this on to a thin but well fitting lining. The back needs no silk, except a double shirring and the narrow ruffle. It should button at the back or on the shoulder and under the arm, to leave the front straight. The outside should be tacked to the lining across the bust under the gathers and at the belt. This can be white or in colors, and is to be worn under the sleeved Eton jackets. The belt covers the gathers.
 No lady's toilet is complete these days without three or four fancy capes and jabots of lace and ribbon to wear over plain gowns to bring them up to the requirements of teas and dinners where strangers drop in. They are so dressy in themselves that they cover a multitude of sins in the way of old gowns of too particular style, and they can be added in a second.
 One of these, easy to make and very effective, consists of a single piece of lace 12 inches deep, gathered across the chest and left to fall loosely, and is sewed to a sort of shoulder yoke, which gives foundation to gather the lace up on, which falls over them in true bretelle shape. There is a high lace ruffle and a band of blue velvet ribbon around the neck, to which are attached eight fish tail ends of ribbon, four in front and four in the back. A blue velvet belt and ribbon ends add to this dainty vest. It is easy to make and may be of black lace if preferred.
 OLIVE HARPER.
 The Champion Cargo of Hay.
 The British bark Kelverdale recently sailed for Havre from Baltimore with 600 tons of hay, the largest full cargo of hay shipped from this country to Europe. The only other full cargo of hay shipped previously was carried by the German ship Freiburg from New York to Havre and consisted of 400 tons. The Baltimore Shipping company has also chartered the British steamship Sir William Armstrong to load 500 tons of hay for Havre.
