HELEN MULGRAVE;
Or,
JESUIT EXECUTORSHIP.
AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY.
Price in cloth, 75c.; paper, 50c.
This story of the persecutions, trials and hardships which a young and lovely female underwent at the hands of her heartless Jesuit executors, because she saw fit to read and judge for herself in a matter of faith, is most vividly drawn. We do not think we ever read a better written or more interesting novel, if novel it can be called, where all the characters are true to life and act the part that history and our own observation has shown them fully capable of acting. It is fully equal to Miss Sinclair's "Beatrice."

THE MISER'S HEIR: OR, THE YOUNG MILLIONAIRE. By P. Hamilton Myers, author of "Bell Brandon," "Ellen Wolles: Or, the Siege of Fort Stanwix," "The Emigrant Squire," etc. etc. Complete in one volume. Price 50 cents in paper cover, or 75 cents in cloth.
"The scene of the present story is laid in the City of New-York, ere that metropolis had encircled within her broad arms the extent of territory which now marks her limits. Fortunes were made for men in those days while they were sleeping, in the rapid increase of the value of real estate, and the author makes one of those vast accumulations the groundwork of a plot of no common order. The time runs through some fifteen or sixteen years, embracing the boyhood and early manhood of the hero. He has vividly portrayed the baneful effects of avarice—the deep-dyed villainy, the bartering of soul necessary to gratify that passion by distinct means—the one engrossing idea leading the miser, ignis-fatuus like, step by step, till at last he sees that for which he has toiled and sinned, at the very moment of fancied possession, fade like a vision from his grasp. He has depicted unrewarded toil struggling for an honest existence; but while he has drawn a contrast between worthy poverty, and the unblessed wealth of him who accumulates it for himself alone, he has not drawn from the purlieus of overgrown cities those degrading pictures so frequently found in modern literature, which shock the sensibilities, while they may not fail to interest us."

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS:
"Full of authentic information." [Boston Post.
"Immensely interesting." [Sunday Atlas.
"Read the book by all means." [Philad. Daily News.
"A veritable bomb-shell in the shape of an 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' thrown among the English aristocracy." [Boston Journal.
"A fair retort upon the one-sided works of Mrs. Stowe, Dickens, Mrs. Trollope, and others. A story of intense interest." [Evening Bulletin.
"One of the most striking fictions of the season.....In its overpowering descriptions of the social wrongs and miseries to which the lower classes in England and Ireland, in the latter country particularly, are subjected, it is terribly, because faithfully, accurate..... The book exhibits extraordinary powers of description, a noble and manly detestation of tyranny and hypocrisy, a thorough abhorrence of aristocratic assumptions.....In the course of a powerfully wrought narrative, it deals with those abuses in a way that must bring the boiling blood of indignation into the face of every reader."
[N. Y. Express.
"A series of powerful blows at the mock philanthropy of the English aristocracy." [Philad. City Item.
"The author is a gentleman of large legislative, political and social experience.....He has run through it a delicate and intensely interesting thread of romance, and drawn a number of characters with remarkable dramatic power." [Reading Gazette.

PASSION FLOWERS.—By Mrs. Howe. Third Edition. One volume, 16mo. Price 75 cents.
"With these words alone upon its title page, and with no acknowledgement of authorship, Ticknor, Reed & Fields, of Boston, have just issued a volume of poems, which, if we do not greatly err, will take its character is destined to create an interest in the literary world second only to that produced by the sudden apparition of Alexander Smith, the Glasgow poet, a few months ago. The book is not only remarkable in itself, but it indicates a latent power, reserved force, on the part of its author, which makes the present performance great as we feel it to seem but the prelude to something yet higher and holier.
As a specimen of the intense power and passionate earnestness of the writer, when dealing with whatever outrages her sense of right, and conflicts with her moral and religious convictions, we give some of the concluding stanzas of the poem entitled 'From Newport to Rome.' She represents herself in the midst of the fashion and folly of the great Northern watering place at the time of the overthrow of the Roman Republic, and is constrained to break in upon the music and dancing with her startling description of the last struggle of the doomed city against the combined forces of Papal Despotism. The picture is fearfully vivid. * * * * * * * *
A word as to the author. Rumor corroborates the internal evidence afforded by the book itself that its writer is the wife of a highly distinguished American gentleman and philanthropist of Boston—a lady whose genius and culture have been so well known to her friends as to exempt them from any surprise at their manifestation in her 'Passion Flowers.'" [National Era.
The name of the author is withheld; but no one with a spark of feeling or the least sense of beauty can read a page of the book without recognizing in the impassioned tone of the true sacerdotal of song. These are no insipid rhymes, put together in an idle humor or to gratify vanity. The strain is lofty, religious—not morbid. There is in it the delicacy of sentiment so admired in Tennyson. The sentiment is womanly, but the mind has a masculine scope and vigor. One or two of the pieces are apt illustrations of humor. "Rome" is one of the most fresh, spirited, artistic, genuine poems we have seen for years. It is exquisite, melting, and at times breathes an aspiration that lifts the heart. We know of no living poet of her race with whom to compare the author of "Passion Flowers" except Mrs. Browning, whom she resembles, however, only in her generous and high culture and in the elevation and depth of her sentiments. Lovers of poetry here will feel a special interest in the history of this gifted minstrel, from the fact that she is confidently stated to be the sister of a late highly esteemed citizen of New-York, although a resident of a neighboring State." [New-York Evening Post.
"Were it not for frequent passages which claim to reveal a feminine history, we should not have suspected these poems to be the production of a woman. They form an entirely unique class in the whole range of female literature. Had Margaret Fuller ever found a Fourier to systematize her impulsive inspiration, she would have sung in similar strains; but now they are without a prototype. Compared with them, in point of depth and intensity of thought, even Mrs. Browning's wonderful creations are pale and ineffectual. * * * * Blended with the key-note of sorrow and self-exercise there are occasional strains of divine tenderness and at infrequent intervals the pensive melody of the poetess is diversified by the ringing sounds of anti-slavery satire. Woe to the decisions who are given to scribe under the trenchant sarcasm of her fiery rebuke. Several of the most elaborate pieces are suggested by the recollections of Rome. While the sad contradictions of the Eternal City touch the writer with profound sympathy, she gathered refreshment and strength from its motherly influence, which she does not fail to commemorate in her most pleasing verse. The piece entitled 'Wherefore,' on the fall of Kossuth, is marked by great beauty of conception, by the energy of expression almost terrible. 'Whit Sunday in the Church,' with a reminiscence of Emerson's 'Problem,' is an impassioned outcry for the restoration of primitive Christianity. 'Mind versus Mill-stone' is a parable, which gives its own explanation, without the moral, that might as well have been left to the intuition of the reader. A darling fight is attempted in 'Thoughts at the Grave of Elolas and Abelard,' since at the passional significance of the great dramatic tragedy of the Middle Age. In the 'Tribute to a Faithful Servant,' a gush of natural feeling gives an exquisite pathos to the whole composition. But we must not stop to particularize among these poems, each of which has the marks of unmistakable genuineness—a product wrung with tears and prayer from the deepest soul of the writer. Scarce a volume can be named so free from imitativeness, showing so little of the influence of other minds as this, so original revelation of a peculiar and most suggestive experience."
[New-York Tribune.
"Not long since a book of poems, entitled 'Passion Flowers' with no mention of the author's name, came from the press of Ticknor & Co. No announcement heralded the publication. Nobody had any reason to suppose that anything of all extraordinary was to characterize the new poet. But all of a sudden critics began to open their eyes, and readers generally began to be astonished. It is now generally conceded that the author of 'Passion Flowers' whether he or she is (for whether male or female no reader can guess) is to take rank as a poet of the first order. The poet (or poetess) has felt sorrow, and has derived therefrom much inspiration. The hope which lights up the somewhat stoical austerity of the poems is not a hope of anything earthly, but that which reaches within the veil. The 'Passion Flowers' are poems to be studied. They cannot be read and appreciated at once. The world will look for more gems from the anonymous author." [New Covenant.
