NOTICES OF COSETTE.

"Such works as this appear but once in a century. The Parables of Christ have had in essence and purpose no more successful imitation."—[Horace Greeley, in The N. Y. Tribune.

"The second part of Victor Hugo's great work of fiction opens with a graphic description of the battle of Waterloo. * * As we read, the whole stupendous scene of carnage seemed to pass before our eyes, as if the glowing words of the author had inspired us with a portion of that imaginative second sight which had enabled him to call up and depict the half-forgotten past."—[N. Y. Chron., Baptist.

"Politics, national and world-wide; social reform, attempted or needed; religious tenets; the monastic system; crime, its prevention and punishment—these are only part of the subjects. * * As for the story itself, it rolls through these various realms of thought like a stream of burning lava."—[Philadel. Sat. Eve. Post.

"The book of the century, as it deserves to be, since it is the result of a quarter of a century's labor." "Beside being one of the most interesting and natural narratives ever published under the classification of Romance, it is the most minutely philosophical analysis of Life ever given to the world."—[N. Y. Sat. Courier.

"The chef d'œuvre of the most powerful of living masters of French fiction."—[N. Y. World.

"No book published in our day has excited greater interest"—[Brooklyn Eagle.

"We begin to see in this second part of 'Les Misérables' how great is the plan upon which Victor Hugo has constructed his noble work, and how it is intended to embrace all the phases of civilization in the Nineteenth Century."—[Phila. Item.

"At once a novel, a poem, and a philosophical essay, or rather each of the three by turns, it nevertheless preserves an unbroken thread of interest throughout."—[Amer. Pub. Circular.

"For scope of subject, motive, variety of character, and brilliancy of painting, no other book of the day can stand beside it"—[N. Y. Examiner (Baptist).

"Some sparkling wit has intimated that it possesses nearly the tragic power of Eugene Sue! We shall presently be told that the scream of the eagle is nearly as loud as the crow of a cock."—[N. Y. Daily Times.

"It commences with a description of the battle of Waterloo, which is perhaps the finest piece of battle-painting in words that the world has ever seen. It has certainly excited the attacks of all the English reviewers, and such petulant, rancorous and unseemly attacks, as to show that if one great Frenchman lost Waterloo by the sword in 1815, another great Frenchman in 1862 has won it with a mightier weapon. This description of the battle which settled the fate of Europe, will, for the first time with many readers, correct the misrepresentations of the English historians. The sword of Wellington is broken by the pen of Victor Hugo. How Jean Valjean kept his promise to the dying Fantine to care for Cosette; through what terrible dangers and perils, and by herculean efforts he succeeded in performing it; the dismal forlorn condition in which he found her; the unnatural persecutions of the Thénardiers, whose name will become a by-word for all that is brutal and ferocious in the guise of woman; the pursuit by Javert, and the wonderful escape into the convent; the charming details of convent life, the still more wonderful escape out of the convent, and the denouement—of all these it would be cruel to deprive the reader of the pleasure of surprise."—[N. Y. Daily Transcript.

"It is something to be thankful to God for, when a mind like that of Victor Hugo devotes its transcendant powers to the reiteration of a lesson so grand, yet so little thought of, so imperfectly realized. Divine faith and love, conquering, triumphing without seeming to triumph, over human hate and skepticism—this is what is taught."—[N. Y. Sunday Times.

"There is nothing grander in all literature."—[Brooklyn News.

"There are numerous sharp, swift-flowing sentences which absolutely burn into the soul of the reader, so electric are they with personal experience, aspiration, and passion."—[Boston Transcript.

"The simplest incidents, the simplest characters, the simplest scenes, make up what is rather a parable than a novel; and yet there never was a book that held so much of tragedy and pathos. * * * The product of a genius as noble as it is great."—[Buffalo Express.

"So compact is the whole story, that intelligent quotation is scarcely possible, except from the philosophical and satirical portions of the book."—[Albany Atlas.

"The most perfect work of his genius and the ripest fruit of his rich experience."—[N. Y. Illustrated News.

"One of the most remarkable productions of the age. By awakening the better feelings of our nature, enlisting our sympathies for the poor and the oppressed, holding forth the highest motives to benevolent action, and giving us a sense of responsibility for the woes and and wrongs of society, it may be of great service."—[N. Y. Christian Advocate and Journal.

A series of papers written by Federal Prisoners (Privates) in Richmond, Tuscaloosa, New-Orleans, and Salisbury, N. C., with appendix.

1 vol. 16mo., Cloth. Price 50 cents.

Unlike anything which has before been written, full of the purest patriotism, this little book is an undying honor to its several authors, and the noble army of which they form so noble a part. It will take its place in history, a living evidence of the moral and intellectual worth of that "rank and file" who, going forth at their country's call, have never wavered, but, with unswerving bravery, have gone on performing deeds of valor and heroism of which we may well be proud. Suffering all things, enduring all things, and scrificing all things, they have earned for themselves the everlasting gratitude of their country. Let all those who would know of what our armies are composed, read this little memorial of the Privates.
