Directions for making PRIME MESS PORK to meet the requirements of the English market. By Robert P. Getty, New-York.
QUALITY AND WEIGHT OF PIGS.
The Pigs to weigh from one hundred to one hundred and sixty pounds each, and to be in good condition, strictly corn-fed or hard fed. For the United States army the weight may be extended to one hundred and seventy pounds.
PARTS EXCLUDED.
The head is to be excluded; also the fore leg up to the breast without the third leg including the hock or gambrel joint, and the lumps of the hams are not cut up with the sides.
WHAT CONSTITUTES A BARREL OF PRIME MESS.
A barrel of Prime Mess Pork consists of fifty pieces, or four quarters each. If the hams are cut up, and put in, there shall be two other twenty-three side-pieces; if without hams, then there shall be thirty side-pieces.
HOW TO CUT AND CURE.
After the Pig has been split through the back, cut each side longitudinally into two strips; pack the strips into large tubs or vats, and fill up with brine, having saltpeter added at the rate of one ounce to three gallons of brine; leave the strips in the brine for eight to ten days to extract the blood, and for the fresh meat to take a pink color.
When ready to be packed into barrels, have each strip carefully trimmed, scraped and brush if necessary, cut them into four-pound pieces as nearly as may be; Mess (select the pieces as indicated, and pack neatly and compactly in layers, with a sufficient salt to preserve it.
BARRELS.
The barrel should be twenty-eight inches long and seventeen and a half inches over the wood (when finished,) made of seasoned white-oak free from sap, the bound with hickory or white oak hoops, and one iron hoop (one inch wide) on each end, and four below the chime-hoops.
THEORY OF DRESSING.
Pigs, averaging say one hundred and forty-five pounds, will weigh up in dressing about as follows: When the side, including the ham, is cut up, there will be twenty-three or twenty-four pieces of side-meat, eight pieces of ham and saddle, and sixteen or eighteen of shoulder and neck to the barrel; excluding the hams, the number of side-pieces will be increased to thirty-one or thirty-two. In no case should there be more than six pieces of the leg part of the shoulder put into a barrel.
