LITERARY ITEMS.

The March number of "Blackwood's Magazine" contains a self-complacent and merciless criticism on the "Old Helmet," a religious novel by our countrywoman, the popular authoress of "The Wide, Wide World." Her works, the Blackwood reviewer informs us have met with more universal acceptance than any reprint except "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Every railway library presents a row of them on sale, and wherever there are school-room book-shelves or a parish library to be referred to, these tales, well-thumbed and with every trace of favor are forthcoming. The review regards Miss Warner as the representative of American religious fiction, the influence of which he absurdly endeavors to detect in "the young lady-hood of a certain religious school." "We notice an independence of conventional restraints, a freedom of accent, an ease in asserting and enforcing opinion, a looseness from the old deference to elders, an aptitude to engraft flirtation on schemes of active good—not, as of old, timidly and evasively, but as a boldly-recognizing aid to zeal and consistency—and, finally, a courageous self-reliance, not without its attractions, where a pretty face and sprightly manners carry it off, but still reminding us that we live in days when woman's rights are a 'leading question,' and women are called upon from across the ocean to rouse from their passive dependence, and henceforth to walk in advance of man in the path of reform and spiritual progress."

We have received the first number of a new periodical from New-Orleans, called "The Crescent Monthly," and devoted to literature, art, science, and society. It is intended to represent the public sentiment of the South, while it will also aim to be attractive and useful to general readers in every portion of the country. Among its selections is an able paper by Professor Tyndall on "The Constitution of the Universe," from "The Fortnightly Review." An original article on Professor Draper's "Civil Policy in America" subjects the views of that work to a critical examination, and pronounces them to be, in many respects, defective and untenable. The contributors to "The Crescent" include many of the most eminent names in the literature of the South, as William Gilmore Simms, Professor Dimitry, John R. Thompson, Paul H. Hayne, John Esten Cooke, Miss Augusta Evans, and others.

Mr. Alexander Strahan has issued several recent London publications, most of them in a beautiful style of typography. They include "How to Study the New Testament," by Dean Alford, in which the author uses the "Queen's English" to good effect in a series of popular directions for the use of the Sacred Writings; Plumptre's translation of "The Tragedy of Sophocles," with a biographical essay; "Citoyenne Jacqueline," a story founded on incidents of the French Revolution, by Sarah Tytler; and "Six Months Among the Charities of Europe," by John de Leilde, a work of peculiar interest, which we shall notice more at length in our columns.
