GERMAN POLITICAL LEADERS. By HERBERT TUTTLE. (HEROES OF THE PEOPLE BIOGRAPHIES.) 12mo. pp. 264. George P. Putnam's Sons.

The materials for these biographical sketches have been gathered by the author during a residence of several years in Berlin, in which period he has made the political affairs and public men of Germany the subjects of special intelligent study. His work includes several names of great prominence in German politics, but with which few readers in this country have become familiar. The chapter devoted to Prince Bismarck is, of course, one of the most important in the book, presenting a compact and lucid history of the career of the great Prussian, an analysis of his principles of statesmanship, and several characteristic personal anecdotes. The fame of Bismarck as a diplomatist has greatly overshadowed his position as a parliamentary leader. But, as represented by the author, he could not have failed to win distinction even as a private member of the legislature. He has not, indeed, the endowments of a great orator; he lacks imagination; has no pathos; his manner is ineffective; and his delivery without facility or grace. But apart from eloquence, he possesses the qualities, in no small degree, which act on a deliberative assembly. He shows an equal power of persuasion and command. His accomplishments as a debater are rarely found in political life. Few Germans have so rich a store of wit and humor. If too slow of utterance, his speeches always read well, and, indeed, are models of sound and forcible logic. His whole career before entering the Prussian ministry was one of study and preparation. His knowledge of modern languages is extensive and profound. He is a consummate master of history, especially of that of his own country. His thorough acquaintance with political details, and his habits of exact observation, in the opinion of the author, are the key to his inspiration and the secret of his success. The statement which has been made in some recent books of reference that Bismarck once fought a duel with Professor Virchow is shown to be incorrect in the biography of that eminent physiologist. After a hot debate in the House of Deputies, about ten years ago, in which Bismarck considered himself personally insulted by Virchow, he sent the professor a challenge, but it was not accepted by the latter, who was cordially sustained in his course not only by his political friends, but by the highest public opinion in Germany. Mr. Tuttle has done ample justice to the eminent men, whom he has selected for the subjects of his sketches. He writes with knowledge, with dignity, and good taste. He makes no appeal to a partisan spirit, but treats his characters with remarkable impartiality. His style is terse and, simple, and consequently forcible. His manner shows the good effect of a wide acquaintance with men and with affairs, in its freedom from pretension, its aptness and point, and its economy of language, making a few words do the work of many pages.

WORKING PEOPLE AND THEIR EMPLOYERS. By WASHINGTON GLADDEN. 12mo. pp. 241. Boston: Lockwood, Brooks & Co.

The questions at issue between labor and capital are here treated not so much in the light of political economy, as from the standpoint of social ethics and Christian principle. Indeed the substance of the book appears to have been intended for delivery from the pulpit, although the themes which it considers are decidedly of secular interest. The author more than once alludes to the fact that he has been a practical workingman himself, not in the sense of a brain-laborer, but as a boy on the farm, and a mechanic's apprentice. Hence he is not ignorant of the wants of the working classes, and his suggestions, in general, are drawn from experience rather than theory. His book for the most part consists of judicious prudential counsels relating to domestic economy, personal habits, and industrial arrangements, without discussing at length the value of any proposed schemes of social reform. Of the three systems by which labor and capital have been combined—the slave system, the wages system, and the cooperative system—he gives his preference to the latter. He professes to entertain but little hope that the antagonism to which the wages system has given occasion will ever cease until the system itself is totally abolished or greatly modified. The wages system is better than slavery, because conflict is better than apathy, but he maintains that there is a better system than either, and that is cooperation. Under this system, in which the workmen employ themselves, and divide the profits of the business, he believes there would be greater economy of material and better work. The results which have been already obtained from cooperative industry are of a promising character. In France and England the experiment has been tried with remarkable success, and in the latter country the business in one year recently amounted to nearly $57,000,000. The obstacles to success arise from the selfishness and jealousy of human nature. Cooperation, in reality, is the arrangement of the essential factors of industry according to the Christian rule. It is capital and labor adjusting themselves to the form of Christianity, but, like every other outward symbol, is a dead form, unless filled with the living spirit of Christianity itself. In an appendix to the volume Mr. Gladden offers some strictures on the modern theory of nationalizing capital, or the placing of the means and instruments of production in the hands of the government, as representing the collective capacity of the nation, which he denounces with considerable force of argument.

ELEMENTS OF PSYCHOLOGY. By HENRY N. DAY. 12mo. pp. 248. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Professor Day has met with admirable success in presenting the elements of psychology in a form adapted to beginners in metaphysical studies. His book is intended as an introduction to mental science, for which purpose it is eminently adapted by the precision of its statements, the lucidity of its details, the terse brevity of its diction, and its freedom from speculative theories, whether founded on abstract or physiological data. He considers the fact of mind as a finality, and without discussing its connection with matter, explains its functions and operations in he various spheres of its activity, regarding it as the center of a series of causal acts and passive states, the validity of which is found in the testimony of consciousness. He deals exclusively with the elucidation of principles, abstains from all show of erudition, and does not attempt to confirm or illustrate his positions by an appeal to the history of thought. Although an original inquirer, he makes no pretense to novel theories, pursuing the line of thought which was introduced by Plato, and has been followed by Cousin, Jouffroy, Sir William Hamilton, and the great German authorities, whose spirit has been imbibed by the author, but without the mention of their names. The simplicity of language, and the clear and tidy method—if we may be allowed the expression—which characterize the work, render it an excellent preparation for higher studies.

NEWSPAPER POETS; OR, WAIFS AND THEIR AUTHORS. By ALPHONSO A. HOPKINS. 12mo. pp. 317. Rochester: Rural Home Publishing Co.

Many of the wandering stars that have not appealed in vain to the popular sympathies in the columns of the newspapers are here combined in a brilliant constellation which claims an appropriate place in the poetical heavens. The editor has shown a keen instinct for the beautiful in the selection of his materials, and has recognized genuine poetical merit, in different degrees, though without the sanction of a celebrated name. He has admitted no pieces which had not already won their way to public favor, and many of them have even challenged enthusiastic admiration from large circles. They show the vitality of the poetic element which springs up from hidden sources, and often with little culture and less encouragement, expands into spontaneous growths, evincing the germs of a higher life. In deciding upon his choice of poems, the editor has evidently had an affection for those of a contemplative and pathetic character, with little taste for the effusions of coarse humor which have infested the walks of American fugitive poetry. He does not demand an immortal fame for the orphans whom he has taken from their nomadic life, but he has done a kindly service in providing them with a home.

A CENTENNIAL COMMISSIONER IN EUROPE, 1874-76. By JOHN W. FORNEY. 12mo. pp. 412. J. B. Lippincott & Co.

The letters contained in this volume have already been published as editorial correspondence of the author, and are issued in their present form under the supervision of Dr. Shelton Mackenzie. They consist chiefly of light, rapid sketches of men and things, which fell under the notice of the writer in an official European journey, as United States Commissioner of the Centennial Exhibition. Without pretending to supply much novel information, they pass over the beaten tracks of American travel in Europe with a certain airy good humor, and will be read with interest for their lively, but superficial pictures of many characteristic phases of foreign society.

SHAKESPEARE MANUAL. By F. G. FLEAY, M. A. 12mo. pp. 312. Macmillan & Co.

The cream of several costly works on Shakespearean literature, together with the fruits of the author's personal study and research, is presented in this comprehensive volume. It is not remarkable for its arrangements or method, it is limited in its scope as a book of reference, and displays more erudition than original critical judgment, but it contains a fund of information which can hardly be found elsewhere in so limited a space.

Albert Mason has issued a new edition of Eothen, by Alexander William Kinglake, the brilliant prototype of the best recent works of Oriental travel, and perhaps the most fascinating book on the subject in the English language.

A new edition of Osgood's Guide-Book for the Middle States, specially designed for the Centennial Summer, has just been issued. With its 470 pages of close-packed information, its 7 maps and 15 plans, it completely answers the needs of either foreign or home tourists.

F. R. Elliott has written, and D. M. Dewey of Rochester, N. Y., has published, a small Hand-book for Fruit-Growers, intended to give the necessary instructions in the smallest possible compass. The volume may easily be carried in a side-pocket, and thus forms a convenient guide for beginners.

A new edition of The Unknown River, by P. G. Hamerton, without the costly illustrations, is issued by Roberts Brothers. The same house issue a new edition of S. A. Drake's Old Landmarks of Boston, and Old Landmarks of Middlesex, full of quaint antiquarian anecdotes and historical reminiscences.

Professor Baird's Annual Record of Science and Industry (Harper & Brothers) evinces the usual diligence of the industrious compiler in the collection of facts, in which he has been aided by several collaborators of more or less ability. The record is more complete than usual this year, and forms a valuable book of reference for a large class of readers.

The Pacific Tourist, by H. T. Williams, is intended as a transcontinental guide for travelers from the Atlantic to the Pacific, comprising descriptions of the various railway lines, routes of Summer travel, and places of public resort and noted scenery. It is filled with geographical details of interest to the tourist and has copious pictorial illustrations.

A new edition of Mr. George H. Calvert's historical drama of Arnold and André, is published by Lee & Shepard, forming an appropriate and interesting contribution to the literature of the Centennial Year. As the production of a thoughtful and accomplished scholar, thoroughly American in feeling, though foreign in culture, it challenges the attention of intelligent readers.

The Eclectic Magazine for June reprints the instructive paper on "Modern Methods in Navigation and Nautical Astronomy" from the Quarterly Review, an article on "Norman Macleod" from Blackwood, a very readable sketch of "Mrs. Thrale" from Macmillan, "Maxims and Reflections from the German of Goethe," from Fraser, and other articles of general interest.

Scribner, Armstrong & Co. have just published Vol. II., containing Exodus and Leviticus, of Dr. Lange's "Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, Critical, Doctrinal, and Homiletical." The translation of this volume is the work of Dr. Howard Osgood of Rochester, N. Y.; Prof. Mead of Andover, Mass.; Dr. Gardiner of Middletown, Conn., and the Rev. Henry Ferguson of Exeter, N. H. Dr. Schaff, the editor, announces that the remaining volumes of the Old Testament division are fast approaching completion.
