NOTES ON EDUCATION.

Wesleyan expects a freshman class of eighty members.

Musical culture at Amherst is said to be thorough and admirable.

Columbia's freshman class this year is the largest ever entered on her rolls.

Nine thousand pupils demand admission to the public schools of Kansas City.

The last semi-annual school-fund apportionment in Minnesota amounted to $146,509 44.

It is reported that there is more trouble between the allopaths and homœopaths at Michigan University.

The freshman class at Union now numbers between sixty and seventy, and is still receiving additions.

Dartmouth's freshman class has eighty members. It has adopted the English University cap and gown. There are only seven students in the Agricultural College—none entered this term.

A new course in advanced geology will be given this year, at Harvard, by Professor Shaler. Twenty-six men have passed the anticipatory examination, in sophomore rhetoric, and sixty-one in first half-year history.

The University of Wisconsin has ninety-two freshmen. President Bascom writes to THE TRIBUNE to say that the faculty does not agree with the Board of Visitors in their report adverse to the co-education of the sexes.

The colored people of Evansville, Ind., have just held a meeting to discuss indignantly the exclusion of colored pupils from the high school of that city. They propose to take proceedings to test the legality of such exclusion.

The Mayor of Baltimore has been authorized by the City Council to appoint a commission of five citizens to ascertain whether the school system now in operation presents defects, and, if this be the case, how they may be remedied.

The freshman class at Cornell University numbered, up to 2 p. m., Wednesday last, 147, distributed as follows: Optional, 40; Arts, 18; Science, 17; Mechanic Arts, 15; Engineering, 15; Agricultural, 13; Literary, 11; Philosophy, 5; Science and Literature, 5; Architecture, 3; Mathematics, 2; Natural History, 2; Chemistry and Physics, 1. Of this number sixteen are ladies.

Seven of the regular university classes in the Faculty of Arts and Laws of University College, London, are open to women as well as to men, not only in instruction, but also in examinations, class-list honors and competition for prizes. At the present moment, the Joseph Hume Scholarship in jurisprudence ($100 a year for three years) is held by Miss Eliza Ormes; and the Mayer de Rothschild exhibition of $250 for pure mathematics is held by Miss Ellen M. Watson. The classes in the Faculty of Arts and Laws which are open to women are those on the following subjects: First English, and its relations to Icelandic and Moeso-Gothic; Mathematics (Higher Senior Class); Physical Laboratory (for practical instruction in Experimental Physics); Philosophy of Mind, Logic, History of Philosophy, and Ethics; Political Economy; Jurisprudence; and Roman Law. In University College, also, the classes of the Department of the Fine Arts, including drawing, painting, and sculpture, with lectures on anatomy, perspective, and archæology as bearing on art, are open to women equally with men. There is only one class in the Faculty of Science which is open to women, and that is the class of geology and mineralogy. Last year, a female student of this class took the first prize in the examination. Some of the classes in connection with the Royal School of Mines receive female students. Inquiry at South Kensington has produced the official statement that the instruction there is generally given to classes composed of men, "but women may be admitted with the special sanction of the professor." Apart from the women teachers who have a right to the scientific training, and some of whom have availed themselves of it, some women may come in among the general public; and, indeed, in the biology class, have been admitted.

A committee of the Boston School Board gave a hearing last week to the advocates of the admission of girls to the Latin School. Professor Howison, of the Institute of Technology, argued that a demand for a classical education for girls in Boston does exist, and that it is not met by the present educational system. He said that Vassar was not an institution of the very highest order, yet, of thirty-two girls who went there between 1868 and 1877, only six were admitted without conditions, and their deficiency was generally in Latin and the classics. Eleven of these girls went from the Girls' High and Normal School, and not one of these was received without being conditioned. President Runkle, of the Institute of Technology, said that he would have girls admitted at the Latin School at the same age and under the same conditions as boys. He believed that the general means for the education of boys and girls should be essentially the same. President Candler, of the Boston Board of Trade, expressed substantially the same opinion. Principal Hagar, of the State Normal School, said that his experience told him that girls had generally been the superior scholars without overwork. The Rev. James Freeman Clarke said that if it should come to pass that the Boston Latin School should be opened on the system of joint education, he believed that it would be greatly to the advantage of both the boys and the girls. President Warren, of Boston University, said that it would not be a rash innovation nor untried experiment. One girl had already been fitted in the Latin School—the daughter of a master. She came to the school, and finally completed her course by finding her way to the seats and reciting with the other pupils, and this year graduated from the Boston University as a doctor of philosophy. The only alternative for the Latin School was the establishment of another school precisely similar, and even then the girls would not have the advantage of the reputation of the old Latin School. The Latin School would give the girls a better opportunity than the high schools.

His method of teaching languages has had the approbation of the best professors and experts, and better still the seal of abundant success. In his conversations and lectures he has hardly an equal. Their fullness, discrimination, and brilliant portraiture, as well as the keen analysis he gives of men and their times, are exceedingly valuable to the student. There is no one better fitted, or more successful than M. Sauveur as an instructor both of pupils and teachers. No one gives a more accurate command of the language, or a more appreciative estimate of the literature of France. I feel that I cannot too highly commend him to the community in which he labors."
