LITERARY NOTES.

Translations of Escott's "England" into French and German have already been undertaken.

Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Mallock and John Addington Symonds each have new volumes of poems in the press.

A posthumous work by George Sand, with the title "Souvenirs de 1848," has recently appeared in Paris. It is a sort of diary, in which the remarkable events of that year are related.

The copyrights of the early editions of those of Lord Lytton's novels which were published before 1838 have expired. Among these works are "Pelham," "Falkland," "The Disowned," "Devereaux," "Ernest Maltravers" and "Paul Clifford." Changes were made by the author in these novels, after that date, however, so that the publishers (Routledge & Sons) are still protected so far as correct editions of the works as left by the author are concerned.

Under the general title "The Acme Library of Juvenile Classics," the American Book Exchange has undertaken to reprint from new plates illustrated editions of the following famous books: "The Arabian Nights," "The Pilgrim's Progress," "Robinson Crusoe," "Baron Munchausen" and "Gulliver's Travels." They will also bring out illustrated editions of "Don Quixote." Five volumes are ready of the "Library of Universal Knowledge," and the sixth is far along in the press.

It is fourteen years since Mr. Bickersteth published his "Yesterday, To-day and Forever," and a new edition has been called for in England every year since. About 25,000 copies have been sold there, but in this country the circulation has been double that number. The London Times says that in spite of these statistics the book is probably very little if at all known to "a large body of its readers who are versed in poetical literature"—due no doubt to its ardent theological sympathies.

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett is credited by a Western newspaper with the authorship of "A Fool's Errand," on the ground of the familiarity shown by the writer with Southern life, the undeniable power of the book, and "certain other characteristic marks" which are not stated. The publishers are still printing and binding the book, and there is not a novel of the day that sells any better. The author's name they continue to withhold from the title-page. Inquiries for it have been so numerous of late that a new edition, just issued, has on the page facing the title a notice stating that "all communications for 'One of the Fools' from other members of the family may be addressed to him, in care of the publishers."

An unpublished letter from Charles Dickens on the opening of Parliament by the Queen in 1854 appeared in The Times (London) the day after the recent opening. Tickets of admission to the ceremony had been sent him, and he returns them with the following comments: "Though reasonably loyal, I do not care much for such sights, and consequently feel that you ought to bestow the places you so obligingly offer me on some more deserving object. The last ceremony of that kind I ever saw was the Queen's coronation, and I thought it looked poor in comparison with my usual country walk. As to Parliament, it does so little and talks so much that the most interesting ceremony I know of in connection with it was performed (with very little state indeed) by one man, who just cleared it out, locked up the place and put the keys in his pocket."

Bibliophiles have at last got an organ which promises to represent them worthily. It is published in Paris as a monthly, and has the title "Le Livre." J. W. Bouton, as a matter of course, will introduce it into this country. The first number is already here. There are two parts in each number, the first being devoted to bibliographical subjects of a more or less permanent interest and printed from very handsome type on superior Dutch paper, in the second part, which is printed on ordinary tinted paper, the articles comprise for the most part a résumé of the current publications in every country of Europe, and also in the United States. The American letter in the first number is written from Boston, and of course Boston books are well cared for; it would be hard to say anything like as much for its treatment of those published in New-York. In another number New-York may get a better chance.

Buckle's works have been translated into German, French, Spanish, Dutch and Russian. The first volume of his "History of Civilization" went through three editions in a little over three years, and yet before this, says Mr. Huth in his "Life of Buckle" (Scribner & Welford), "he had never printed a line." Mr. Huth adds that "there is hardly another instance in history of so great a leap from complete literary obscurity to the highest pinnacle of literary fame," while fifteen years after he was dead reviews and magazine articles on his works had not ceased to appear. Six years before the melancholy death of Buckle at Damascus he had several warnings that his life would not be long. To his friend, Mrs. Grey, in 1856 he wrote as follows: "To break down in the midst of what, according to my measure of greatness, is a great career—and to pass away and make no sign—this I own is a prospect which I now for the first time see is possible; and the thought of which seems to chill my life as it creeps over me. Perhaps I have aspired too high; but I have at times such a sense of power, such a feeling of reach and grasp, and if I may so say, such a command over the realm of thought, that it was no idle vanity to believe that I could do more than I shall now ever be able to effect; I must contract the field." Somewhat later he remarks that of all he had hoped to do he now finds only too surely how small a part he can accomplish. "Something I hope to achieve which will interest the thinkers of this age, and something perhaps on which posterity may build. It will, however, be only a fragment of my original design." Several years before the first volume of his "History" had left his hands his doctor, "suspects the brain has been overworked." "To lose another season," says Buckle, "would be a great vexation to me, and then, too, these early checks make me think mournfully of the future. If I am to be struck down in the vestibule, how shall I enter the temple."
