LITERARY NOTES.

The new "Burlington" sixpenny magazine has Mr. Bret Harte and Mr. Justin McCarthy in its list of contributors. Helen Mathers, the editor, will in the first number begin a new serial entitled "The Story of a Sin."

It is said the professional English novelists of name and fame are being injured in the "emoluments of literature" by the large number of amateur writers who are springing up and who desire no pay for their writings.

Judge Tourgee's new novel, "Bricks without Straw," is rapidly overtaking the still active "Fool's Errand," in Fords, Howard & Hulbert's account of sales. It first appeared six weeks ago, and is now in its forty-fifth thousand.

Dr. Henry C. Angell's "Records of the Late William M. Hunt," which appeared in several numbers of The Atlantic Monthly, have been revised and enlarged, and will be issued in permanent form by James R. Osgood & Co., December 3.

It is proposed to rule out a large class that cumbers the reading-room of the British Museum, to the inconvenience of students, by cutting off the supply of new fiction. The suggestion is to withhold works of fiction until three years after publication.

The London Standard makes the curious statement that "the London press has an immense influence abroad," but does not represent the opinions of the people at home; a certain limited class is influenced, this paper thinks, but the working classes remain absolutely untouched by it.

Harper & Brothers have just issued a biographical sketch of William Cullen Bryant, by Andrew James Symington, a Glasgow manufacturer, who devotes his leisure to literature. It contains many selections from Bryant's poems and other writings, and the volume is uniform with the new biographies of Samuel Lovell and Thomas Moore.

"To recur again to Edwards's so-called 'observations' on the Trinity," says The Boston Transcript, "we seriously regard that essay as of doubtful authenticity. It is confessedly not an autograph. And the internal evidences of its having been either drawn up or worked over by some other person than Jonathan Edwards seem to us considerable. It sounds much more like Samuel Hopkins than like Edwards."

A melancholy interest is given to the last novel of Elsa Liaborit, the distinguished German authoress, by the statement of her sister that it contains the key to her domestic troubles, which drove her to cast herself into the sea at Civita Vecchia about three years ago. The title of the novel is "Zweimal Verunglückt" (twice married).

Prince Napoleon is preparing to place an extra thorn in the side of the hostile Bonapartists who believe the transition of the Empire reposes on the head of his son, Prince Victor. He intends to publish a newspaper, the title of which some reports give as Le Napoleon. It will represent his policy, and ought to be well edited, for friends and foes alike give the Prince full credit for brains and the talents of a practical publicist.

The title of Gustave Flaubert's novel which will be published posthumously in January, is "Bouvard et Pecuchet." The publishing author is said to have given ten years of thought to his "Madame Bovary." This last work, which is philosophical in tone, was as many years on his writing-table, and death alone stayed the hand of revision. The Paris publisher who obtained the manuscript from Flaubert's niece and literary executor had to agree to publish a complete edition of the author's works within two years.

General James A. Brisbin, who wielded a felicitous pen in his reminiscences of sturdy "Ben" Wade, has chosen an economic subject for the new book which J. B. Lippincott & Co. have in press. It is called "The Beef Bonanza; or, How to get Rich on the Plains." He is a believer in the "American Desert," that, in the geographies of twenty years ago, occupied the region between the Missouri and the Rocky Mountains. Some pains have since been taken to prove it a myth. But General Brisbin claims that this region can never be used for any better purpose than the raising of vast herds of cattle, which certainly makes it out a "desert" of much value and fertility.

Two years ago the holiday season was brightened by the appearance of a quaint and lonely book, the "Prince of Argolis." The illustrations by J. Moyr Smith fitted in so exactly with the text that it was well-nigh clear the hand that held the pencil had also held the pen. Henry Holt & Co. have now another holiday book by the same artist, which is not a whit behind the first, and in many respects surpasses it. "The Wooing of the Water-Witch" is a whimsical Norse story, and the illustrations, 145 in number, are fanciful, quaint and comical. No one into whose hands the volume may fall will turn its pages with greater interest, if not with greater relish, than the Earl of Beaconsfield. One of the characters in the illustrations—a sly, mocking, mirthful fellow named Grimgob—wears the traditional Disraeli curl, and his features are continually mimicking that great statesman in scenes that add irresistibly to the force of the clever caricatures.
