LITERARY NOTES.

William Morris, who has for a long time been nursing his muse in silence, has written a poem for The English Illustrated Magazine. It is entitled "Meeting in Winter."

Mr. Charles Dudley Warner has been giving one of his lectures on the relation of literature to life at the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale.

Sir Lepel Griffin, satisfied with the reputation of his criticisms of American society, has undertaken to administer similar punishment in the March Fortnightly to our political institutions;—and this though in British politics he is known as a strong Liberal. Sir Lepel is now Agent Governor-General for Central India and has a beautiful home at the Indore Residency. He is only forty-three years old and is said to owe his rapid official advancement to his political and historical works on India. He it was who as chief political officer in Cabul placed Abdulrahman on the throne as Amir of Afghanistan.

Donna Paz, the amiable daughter of Queen Isabella, has made her appearance in the world of letters. In a very modest way, however; only a private edition of "The Poems of Paz de Borbon" has as yet been printed.

The latest guess as to the authorship of "The Bread-Winners" is that the fortunate or unfortunate person is the Rev. Ross C. Houghton, who once lived and preached in Cleveland. The reasons given for this belief are very slender.

The late Abraham Hayward left no autobiography, but he did leave to the discretion of his executor, Mr. Kinglake, an immense and beautifully arranged collection of correspondence and a rich store of anecdotes.

Apart from American sales, more than 30,000 copies of the English version of "John Bull et Son Ile" have been sold within three months. The author is said to have received from his English publishers an additional check for half as much again as the sum first stipulated for. He was his own translator.

B. M. Croker, the author of "Proper Pride"—one of the most popular serials ever published by THE TRIBUNE—has written another novel, entitled "Pretty Miss Neville." This has just been brought out in the "Franklin Square Library," and proves to be a lively and readable story.

The Macmillans are about to publish, under the title of "The Boy Emigrants," a series of letters from Texas, for which Thomas Hughes has written a preface.

"The History of the United States in Rhyme" (D. Lothrop & Co.) is a neat little book, the form of which may help to fix dates in the young reader's mind.

Mrs. Davidson, the eldest daughter of Hugh Miller, and the author of various moral tales and a volume of poems, lately died at Adelaide.

Thomas Westwood, artist and poet, writing from Brussels to a friend in this city, says that Miss May Probyn, some of whose charming unpublished poems have appeared in THE TRIBUNE, was secretly converted to Catholicism and has become a Sister of Charity at her home in England. Among the other wordly things which she renounces is the writing of verses. She is still a young woman and her poetic vein was by no means exhausted when it suddenly closed.

A spirited little etching by Mr. Thomas Moran ornaments the recent number of The Art Union. The journal contains an article on the art schools of the Academy, which will be useful to those seeking instruction.

One who knew Margaret Fuller says of her and of her husband in Every Other Saturday: "Domestic happiness had softened her character, and the arrogance of her youth had melted in the warm romance of her marriage and the patriotic zeal with which she espoused the liberal ideas of the Marquis. Marquis Ossoli was singularly grave and dignified; the only Italian we ever met who had not the national vivacity and expressive gesture. His hands did not speak for him, nor his eyes become luminous enforcers of his meaning; but if he did not possess the usual attractions, he seemed to have escaped some of the faults belonging to an impulsive and imaginative race, appearing eminently truthful, well-poised and disinterested. Many years younger than his wife, his sudden interest on first meeting her was remarkable. Her real charm was her conversational power, and of that he could form no idea, as at the time she was not familiar with his language. His countrymen are usually worshippers of money, and beauty and devotion to one not possessed of these lures is rare. A subtile sympathy, however, bound him to her, and the marriage proved a mutual blessing."

There is much interesting historical matter in Mrs. Hamlin's book, "Legends of Le Détroit" (Thorndike Nourse), but it has not been presented with literary grace. That field of romance trodden by the French pioneers is yet to be occupied by exploring poets. Mrs. Hamlin's records suggest the material.

The latest edition of "King's Handbook of Boston" has been much enlarged and improved, and furnishes a mass of historical and topographical information indispensable to all visitors in the old town.
