THE MISTRESS OF IBICHSTEIN. A Novel. By Fr. HENKEL. Translated from the German by S. E. BOZES. 16mo. Pp. 333. Henry Holt & Co.

The theme of this story bears such a strong resemblance to those portions of "Great Expectations" which relate to Miss Habisham and Estelia that one cannot help making provoking contrasts between the somewhat cumbrous Henkel and the vigorous and easy-moving Dickens. In the German novel, as in the English masterpiece, we have a wronged and vindictive old woman, living in a solitary old house, among the relics of her youth, and training a beautiful and haughty girl to revenge her injuries by breaking the hearts of lovers. Esther, moreover, resembles Estelia in being a colorless and unpleasant personage, who not only makes herself disagreeable to her associates, but never wins the sympathy of the reader. In the end the cruel scheme of Fräulein von Uern is defeated as the similar project of Miss Habisham was brought to naught, a careful education in heartlessness failing to eradicate some latent and mysterious capability for affection; and the young heiress meets with a happy fate which she has done nothing to deserve. The tale includes a few character sketches (not times of the principal actors) which, though slight, are clear and entertaining, and it presents some well-drawn pictures of dull life in a family of decayed nobles, and gay life at a German ducal court—to which the translator rather oddly awards the style of "royal." These features, together with rapidity of movement, an effective arrangement of contrasts, and a bustling if not really vivacious dialogue, are the principal merits of a book which will no doubt amuse the "Leisure Hour."

STRAY LEAVES FROM STRANGE LITERATURE. By LAFCADIO HEARN. 16mo. Pp. 225. James R. Osgood & Co.

The author of this attractive little volume, having found a great deal of enjoyment in the literature of the Eastward of other remote lands, has made a collection of his favorite stories and parables in the spirit of a dilettante rather than of a scholar. The sources from which he draws are Buddhistic and other Oriental writings, the Talmud, the Kalewala, and some miscellaneous remains, including Egyptian and Polynesian. He knows his materials only in the form of English and French translations, and even of these he has made a pretty free use. The frankness and modesty with which he states his method and purpose disarm criticism. He is well aware that his book has "no claim upon the consideration of scholars." He made it only for the entertainment of the public, and his chief object was to tell a pretty or striking story, caring nothing for the authenticity of the versions, enlarging, condensing, patching, combining, doing in fact about as his taste suggested, and, as he says, cutting all the gems according to one pattern. Hence there is a similarity of style among all the diverse legends, Hindoo, Jewish, Scandinavian, etc., which might even be mistaken for a similarity of spirit, and we should be grievously misled if we read them as specimens of race literature. Mr. Hearn's style, however, is animated and poetical, and is well suited to the simple fraction which he assumes as a teller of tales. He is always interesting. He has brought together a valuable collection of unfamiliar stories, nearly all of them forcible, many of them beautiful and highly imaginative; and he has refined them with a great deal of art. India has yielded him more treasures than the rest of the world, and the reader will be struck by the rich and brilliant quality of the legends from this quarter, as well as the high morality which often inspires them. It is curious that they are superior in both these respects to the rabbinical legends from the Talmud; but of course the Talmud does not represent Judaism in its purity, nor do Mr. Hearn's selections exhibit the Buddhistic books just as they are.
