THE MAGAZINE OF ART.

THE MAGAZINE OF ART. Vol. VII. Cassell & Co., New York, 1884.

The Magazine of Art for 1884 forms a luxurious, if somewhat showy, volume of nearly 700 pages which is well worth permanent preservation. Such illustrations as Mr. Macbeth's etching from his painting "Lady Bountiful" and the process reproductions of Mr. Pennell's vivacious drawings for Vernon Lee's "North Tuscan Notes," give the reader a pleasant first impression which will surely persuade him to continue. In the presence of sixty-four full-page and a vast variety of minor illustrations, we can only say that the engravings show intelligent workmanship and clean results, while the full-page subjects naturally present the works of English painters for the most part, although there is a fair representation of German art. French art seems to us but scantily recognized, and yet the conductors of the magazine have have made their French selections judiciously. For example, no slight interest attaches to the contrasted busts of Victor Hugo, one by David in 1844, the other by Rodin in 1884. The force of Rodin's nervous, virile work is felt in this reproduction. Many illustrations accompany Mr. A. Egmont Hake's articles upon "Sculpture at the Comédie Française." In Mr. Hannay's paper, "Some Portraits of Carlyle," we may compare the rugged features of the much discussed philosopher as portrayed by Messrs. Watts, Whistler, Legros and Howard, and in sculpture by Messrs. Woolner and Boehm. The original portrait by Mr. Watts is now at the Metropolitan Museum of Art. The text is not to be ignored in turning the pages which bear engravings after Boughton, Orchardson, Hunter, Langley, Millet, Gericault, Delacroix, Menzel, Mileke, Kauffman, and the Russian battle painter Verestchagin, to say nothing of the colored prints after Burne-Jones and Botticelli. In any purely literary periodical such papers as those by Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson on "Fontainebleau" and "A penny plain and two pence colored," and by Mr. Andrew Lang on "Elzevirs," would be welcome. The second of Mr. Stevenson's papers, which depicts in humorous yet tender language his youthful enjoyment of "Skelt's Juvenile Drama," is written in the vein which characterized "Travels With a Donkey," and gained for the author so many friends. Mr. Brownell's article upon "The American Salon" has a local value, since the American salon has been transferred to this city and will be opened next week. Two of the paintings engraved here are now on exhibition in the city, Mr. Dannat's "Quatuor" at Schaus's, and Mr. Bridgman's "Bath at Home" at Knoedler's. The works of Messrs. Boggs, Wyatt Eaton and Grayson also find place in these pages. Of the miscellaneous subjects it is enough to say that the veriest dilettante, the most curious hunter of bric-à-brac should find something in this volume congenial to his tastes. And any one who wishes to retrace the course of the year's art in this country can readily do so by running through the carefully prepared "Chronicles of American Art."
