HENRY JAMES.

THE LITERARY REMAINS OF THE LATE HENRY JAMES. Edited with an introduction by WILLIAM JAMES. 12mo., pp. 471. James R. Osgood & Co.

The filial task performed by Mr. James in the introduction to this volume will be highly appreciated by those who are interested in his father's philosophical system. It is not a mere piece of "perfunctory work, but it is a striking and intelligible exposition of the ideas of a thinker who certainly needs a sympathetic interpreter. If the elder Henry James is greatly misunderstood—or, perhaps, we should say, is not understood—the reason is not in his literary style, for that is singularly lucid and easy, but in the peculiarities both of his fundamental thought and of his method of argument. Mr. James begins with the conception of God, the Creator, a primary fact, not to be discussed, but to be accepted as unquestionable. From the idea of the Creator he proceeds to a remarkable view of creation as a process "forced upon the Creator by the character of that positively yawning emptiness which is the opposite of himself, and with which he has to deal." This process does not take place by a direct fiat, "exploding the universal absolutely out of what was previously pure blank," but the Creator is obliged to produce first an illusory stage, which by decaying unto itself becomes a surface of rebound for another movement, the result of which is real. In some respects this seems to be an echo of Hegel, but Mr. James elaborates the idea in his own way. The first, or illusory, process, Mr. James calls formation, and the result is Nature, using that word in an extended sense peculiar to himself. The second he calls redemption, and the result is Society, not society as we now have it, but a regenerate social order which we are to attain at some future time. This will be the real creation, the finished spiritual work of God. Conscience and religion are faculties belonging to the illusory stage, which have no other function than that of weaning humanity from the "fallacious selfhood," which constitutes the distinctive lie of unredeemed and unreal nature; and being mere transitory shams they have no worth in themselves.

To make a full statement of Mr. James's system would be to write a philosophical essay, and for that there is no occasion. He never founded a school, and he has had very few disciples. Nor is it likely that many will ever be attracted toward a philosophy which requires so many abstruse qualifications and unusual definitions that it is almost impossible to state it without misleading. That it is pantheistic the editor hardly denies, although Mr. James himself denounced pantheism. That it repudiates the moral law and derides the religious sentiment is quite clear; and it is of course directly opposed to the teachings of the Scripture, for which, nevertheless, the author avows a sort of respect. "We have been traditionally taught that good and evil, heaven and hell, were objective realities, having an absolute ground of being in the creative perfection. But this is the baldest, most bewildering nonsense. They have not a grain of objective reality in them, and are no way vitalized by the absolute Divine perfection. They are purely subjective appearances, vitalized exclusively by the created imperfection, or the uses they subserve to our provisional moral and rational consciousness. When accordingly, this consciousness—having more than fulfilled its legitimate office, and become, as it now is, a mere stumbling block or rock of offence to the regenerate mind of the race—finally expires in its own stench, or else frankly allows itself to be taken up and disappear in ovr advancing social and æsthetic consciousness, good and evil, heaven and hell, will cease to be appearances even." A note on page 108 gives a curious illustration of the difficulty of stating precisely Mr. James's attitude toward questions even so great as the inspiration of the Bible and the historical truth of the Gospels. But it is plain that out of his writings it would be easy to deduce lessons of the most radical skepticism and the most dangerous practical antinomianism, although he himself would have declared such deductions unwarrantable. His manner, which is often vehement to the point of vituperation, might confirm the erroneous impression created by a superficial study of his theory, for he bestows upon what he regards as philosophical errors a great deal of that passionate rhetoric which abounds mostly in the blatant discourses of the lowest order of infidel lectures; so that we have to pull ourselves together before we realize that this adversary of the churches is a philosopher who builds everything upon an intense belief in God. It must be carefully observed, however, that what Mr. William James calls his father's "somewhat reckless invective humor" was entirely free from both vulgarity and intellectual pride.

The Remains now given to the public include an essay on "Spiritual Creation," in which the system faintly outlined above is set forth in vigorous and fascinating English; "Some Personal Recollections of Carlyle," reprinted from The Atlantic Monthly; and the fragment of an Autobiography (under the pseudonym of Stephen Dewhurst), which recently appeared in the same periodical. With the light thrown upon it by the Introduction, this last piece becomes much more interesting than it was in the magazine.

For Boys and Young Men—City.

PACKARD'S COLLEGE AND SCHOOL OF SHORTHAND.—This is a rare combination—two excellent and independent institutions under one roof and one management. They are each independent of the other, and both are the best of their kind. Recently a new magazine has been started by Packard. It covers the requisites of the shorthand business pretty fully, leaving little to be desired in this direction. In sending for it sell it Packard's Shorthand Reporter, for that is its title. Single copies cost but 20 cents, and a year's subscription only two dollars—cheap, very cheap, either way. For any information not given in this "ad," address, with full confidence, S. S. PACKARD, 805 Broadway.
