NOTES ON EDUCATION.

Ex-President R. B. Hayes delivered an interesting address on education the other day, before the Farmers' Institute of Sandusky County, Ohio. "We should learn," he said, "the living languages—German and French, and above all, we should study far more than we do in our schools the literature and language that we call English. Many and many a boy goes through our colleges that can talk glibly about ancient heroes and the poets of Greece and Rome and yet knows very little about the great poets and historians of America. And this is only leading up in the line of reform. What after all is the object of education? Plainly this: To fit the young for the duties of life, the young of both sexes. Now what are the duties of life? What is the first duty of life? Evidently and plainly to be self-supporting, to be able to make an honest living. How much are our schools doing for that? How much good are they doing? I happened this week to be at a New-York college in which in about six months one good trade is taught to a boy, and in the period between twelve and eighteen the essential parts of several trades may be taught to boys, and by devoting only one or two hours a day during the six days of the week to the business. Now I need not go into a detail of the system in particular. Trades used to be learned in a way which was profitable rather to the master than the apprentice, as was explained to me there, where they were teaching moulding. Under the old rules of the apprenticeship system a boy used to be kept shovelling sand about seven years in learning the trade. All there is in shovelling sand is to be industrious and a boy can learn it in fifteen minutes, and in six months all the art and history of moulding. Now I go one step further than some friends of industrial education. It is not merely to make them self-supporting. I am confident, from my knowledge of men, that there is no better way to give a man a mastery of his intellectual faculties and to discipline his mind than by having him learn a trade."

Archdeacon Farrar is very severe in his condemnation of over-pressure in modern schools. He speaks of it as "the Juggernaut car of Cram, before which the English Nation is throwing its children by thousands, to have all their qualities crushed out before its ponderous wheels." The Archdeacon uses a somewhat rhetorical hammer, but he hits the nail on the head.

The co-operative store started in 1881 by a number of professors and students of Harvard University has not been a financial success, and the Board of Directors will soon close it.

Sir William Muir, the new principal of Edinburgh University, is the successor of a long line of famous men. Sir Alexander Grant, his immediate predecessor, once said that there had been four great names in the list of principals—Archbishop Leighton, William Carstairs, Robertson and Sir David Brewster. Archbishop Leighton, "the Fenelon of Scotland," was principal during the Protectorate of Cromwell. William Carstairs is described by Macaulay as "a Presbyterian Minister of Scotland who in craft and courage had no superior among the politicians of his age." It was while Robertson was principal of the university that he brought out his histories of Charles V. and of America. Sir David Brewster was seventy-seven years of age when he accepted the office; but he did not allow his years to impair his energy or usefulness, and worked harder and to more purpose than many a younger man.

Commodore Luce, U. S. N., who has been designated president of the War College to be opened on Coasters Harbor Island, near Newport, R. I., has entered upon the duties of his office. There will be two courses in the college, that of the science and art of war, and that of law and history.

Superintendent McAllister, of the Philadelphia public schools, has been elected a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania.

It is likely that a school of technology will be established in the University of the South, at Sewanee, Tenn.

The library building of Yale College will soon be enlarged and improved.

Practical anatomy is taught in some of the public schools of New-Haven, Conn., by the dissection of dead cats and rabbits.

Says "The Philadelphia Ledger": "A compulsory law ordering the pictures of drunkards' stomachs into the school books, and the study of inflammations and congestions into children's class exercises, should not be hastily rushed through the Legislature as an easy relegation of the subject of alcoholism to the tender young generation. If grown men, who know by every day's observation and by the popular information concerning alcoholism that is so freely distributed in the public prints, do not find themselves strong enough to regulate the subject of liquor traffic, what is to be gained by putting such repulsive testimony before babes? A child fed on Robinson Crusoe does not imbibe a dread of the sea; for all of Defoe's eloquence of privation, he rather inclines to set up on a desert island of his own until the effect passes off. Nor is there any special beauty to the juvenile eye in a diagram of the pale pink stomach of health over and above the deep red and livid spots of the diseased organ on a chart."

"The New-Haven Palladium" gives the following account of a recent "reading test" in that city: "The story recently given as a test to grades VII and VIII and the high school was a German legend containing about 500 words. When the scholars had read the story they were to rewrite it from memory. Seven minutes were allowed for reading and three-quarters of an hour for writing. The papers were marked with reference to fulness of statement, language, capitals, punctuation, spelling and penmanship. Many errors were found in the use of capitals. Many sentences were begun without capital letters and the personal pronoun I was frequently spelled with a small letter. In punctuation, periods, commas and interrogation points were used in improper places and laughably interchanged with each other. Some of the errors in spelling are amusing. Angrily was spelled angerly, angurly, angrally, angrily; any was spelled ani; crooked was spelled crooket, crucket, crucked and croocked; did not was represented by didnet; cried was spelled cryd; education was spelled egergation; wrong was expressed by rong and guide by gide and guid; just was spelled with a g and sed represented one scholar's idea of the word said; yourn often expressed the possesive case of one of the personal prenouns. Sheeps was a frequent way in which the plural number of sheep was expressed."

THE DESCRIPTIVE ATLAS OF THE CESNOLA COLLECTION.

This work, which is being brought out by J. R. Osgood & Co., will consist of three volumes, each of which will contain a hundred and fifty heliotype plates, one-third of them colored. The first volume—which has lately appeared—is devoted to the sculpture of the collection. The general preface is by Professor Ernest Curtius; and General di Cesnola furnishes a prefatory article on his explorations and excavations in Cyprus. In the preparation of the rest of the work he has availed himself largely of the aid of specialists. The volume is a large folio, elegantly printed on thick paper. It is sold only by subscription.

CONTEMPORARY SOCIALISM.

1 vol, 8vo. $2.

CONTENTS:

1. Introductory.
2. Ferdinand Lassalle.
3. Karl Marx.
4. The Federalism of Carl Marlo.
5. The Socialists of the Chair
6. The Christian Socialists.
7. Russian Nihilism.
8. Socialism and the Social Question.
9. Progress and Poverty: Henry George.

"Mr. Rae is a benefactor to his fellow men. He has produced one of the most excellent of the labor-saving contrivances—a Book, the reading of which dispenses with all need of ever looking at several hundred others. Mr. Rae's essay on Nihilism is as good as anything that we have seen on this mysterious subject, but there are few persons who are interested in the history of the present century that will not be glad to read the whole book, and some parts of it more than once. We will only add that the analysis of Mr. Henry George's theories is extremely well done. It undermines the very foundations on which Mr. George's structure is built, and the whole fabric dissolves before our eyes."—The Evening Post.

"A book on 'Contemporary Socialism' by John Rae is sure to find many readers. Apart, however, from the timely interest of its subject and the antecedent merits of the author, this book deserves to be widely read. It is carefully and clearly written, and is evidently the product of studious and independent investigation."—Evening News (London).
