LITERARY NOTES.

The fifth and concluding volume of Mr. Comthope's new edition of the works of Alexander Pope will be published in November, and will contain his Life of Pope, with a copious index to all the volumes. The edition is in ten volumes, the poems occupying Vols. I to IV., and the prose works and correspondence Vols. VI to X.

A forthcoming volume of the Hakluyt Society Series will describe the two famous old globes in the library of the Middle Temple—the first celestial and terrestrial globes ever made in England. The maker was E. Molyneux, and the date is 1593; but the geography on the terrestrial globe was afterward brought down to 1603.

A volume of verse, "Flower Pieces and Other Poems," by William Allingham is announced as nearly ready.

"The Saturday Review" calls Mr. Lowell "the best after-dinner speaker we have had in England since the death of Dickens." But it declares that in his new collection of political essays there is an excess of over-familiar illustration. "Macbeath," it says, "who 'could be happy with either, were t'other dear charmer away,' appears twice. Perhaps it is time that both the dear charmers, and Macbeath with them, were put out of the way. The wound which was great because it was so small; the victorious cause which pleased the gods, though it did not please Cato; the Benzonian challenged to make his choice of a king; Agesilaus romping with his children; the gold coin which did not smell in the nostrils of the Roman Emperor; Caliph Omar and the burning of libraries; the Old Man of the Sea; the Dragon's Teeth; Dr. Sangrado; the Magician's servant who called up spirits that he could not control, are among the old acquaintances whom we are somewhat surprised to have introduced to us anew by Mr. Lowell. But his essays, with one exception, were written more than twenty years ago, for American readers, and perhaps these illustrations had more freshness and novelty then and there than they have for us now and here." This is certainly rather bad, Mr. Lowell.

To few women has been given such high praise as "The Athenaeum" bestows upon Mrs. Green, the widow of the historian, for her monograph on Henry II. It calls her "a writer of rare historical ability," and says that the "real value of this book is to be sought not in the charm of a brilliant style, or the surprising width of the knowledge it exhibits, or the vividness of the portraiture, or the subtlety with which some legal and constitutional questions are handled, but in the masterly manner in which the main object has been kept in view from first to last, and, though nothing in the history of his reign has been slurred over, everything has been subordinated to the setting forth the statesmanship of the king."

"Do not call me Esq. in the contents, a common shepherd lad cannot be Esq. Say James Hogg, the Scot's shepherd, or something that way," wrote Hogg, in a letter accompanying a song which was to appear in a collection. The letter has just been sold at auction in London.

Miss Constance Frederica Gordon-Cumming, traveller and author, gets $250 a year from the British Civil List, in consideration of her literary merits.

"I am of the opinion that your system of teaching languages is superior to any other in which I have had any experience. It is very properly called the 'Natural Method.' The members of my family who have been under your instruction have made better progress in learning to speak German than I have ever known to be made in the same time by pupils under any other system. In short, your 'Natural Method' is the only efficient way to learn to speak a language, and I am glad to have this opportunity of giving you my opinion of its great value." W. S. GIRNEY, Jr., Esq., New-York.
