NEW BOOKS AND NEW EDITIONS.

The Henry Irving Shakespeare is completed with the issue of the eighth volume (Gardiner & Wellford), and we can sincerely repeat at the end of this enterprise all that we said of it in the beginning. The final volume contains "Hamlet," "Henry the Eighth" and "Pericles," with the Poems and Sonnets. The "Hamlet" has been edited with great—it may almost be said too great—care; for the profusion of the notes includes not a few points which seem to require no interpretation whatever. Mr. Irving furnishes a prefatory note, in which he pays deserved tribute to the memory of the late Frank Marshall, whose untimely taking off delayed the publication of this volume. The general introduction and life of Shakespeare is by the veteran Dr. Dowden, whose erudition and sound critical judgment command respect and invite confidence. The biography, while compact, is full of essential matter, and embraces a critical sketch as well as a chronology of the plays. It deals only with ascertained facts, but it shows that much more is known of Shakespeare than Steevens and Malone believed. Mr. Marshall was able to write the introduction to "Hamlet" and some of the notes. The greater part of the latter, however, were supplied by Mr. Arthur Symons, who has also written the introduction to "King Henry the Eighth," together with the notes. The notes and introduction to "Pericles" are by Mr. P. Z. Round, and those to the Poems are by Mr. A. Wilson Verity. The illustrations of the last volume are less numerous than in the earlier ones, but of the same type and standard. The Henry Irving edition will now take its place as one of the most thorough and careful, and it cannot fail to win popularity.

The tenth volume of the Park-side Shakespeare (The Shakespeare Society of New-York) contains "King Lear," the Pivers' Text of 1608, with the Heminges and Condell text of 1623. It has an introduction "touching the Priority of the Pide Bull Quarto, the Dependence of the Folio Text upon the original sketch of the Play, and sundry points of textual criticism," by Alvey Augustus Adee, A. M. Mr. Adee has given close study to the questions which he discusses, and those who may find it difficult to follow him in the controversy of the Quartos will probably be interested in his treatment of various other points, as, for instance, the acting difference between the sham insanity of Edgar and the real madness of Lear. It is true, as Mr. Adee says, that most actors of Edgar seem to think it their business to set up a rivalry with Lear, whereas the whole play shows that the mock madness of Edgar should be made manifest as a travesty, and should be distinctly contrasted with the genuine alienation of the old king. There is much acuteness in this and other criticism.

The twenty-fourth volume of the "Dictionary of National Biography" (Macmillan & Co.) includes the names Hailes—Harriott, between which appear biographies of the various Haines, Hales, Hakewills, Hale (Halduyt is here too), the Halliburtons, Halletts, Halls (a numerous race), Hallidays, Hallows, Hallwells, Hamiltons (over 100 pages of them), Hammonds, Hampdens (but not the Viscounts), the Hanberys, Hancocks, Hannays, Hansons, Harcourts, Hardinges, Hardwicks, Hardys, Hares, Harleys, Harpers and Harringtons. Many of the political sketches are long, and the list of contributors is as usual a sufficient guarantee for the quality and trustworthiness of the work.

The fifth volume of Henry Morley's "English Writers" (Cassell & Co.), which contains the second part of the "Literature of the Fourteenth Century," is for the most part occupied with an elaborate examination of Chaucer. The first five chapters treat of Church Reform and Wycliff. All the rest deal with Chaucer, historically and critically. In the twelfth chapter, on the minor works ascribed to that poet, Professor Morley takes issue with earlier critics, holding that the authorship of "The Flower and the Leaf" must be regarded as unsettled, there being no positive evidence either way. His opinion as to the other minor poems is much the same.

The tenth volume of the "Carisbrooke Library" (George Routledge & Sons) contains "Ireland Under Elizabeth and James the First," being reproductions of the accounts and descriptions of Edmund Spenser, the poet; Sir John Davis, James the First's Attorney General, and Fynes Morryson, secretary to Lord Mountjoy, the Lord Deputy. The collection is edited by Henry Morley. These old papers present interesting and curious views of the Ireland of their period, and furnish appalling evidence of the sufferings inflicted upon the Irish people by the colonists and the English troops. The examples of cannibalism to which some of the famine-stricken wretches were driven are described with an old-fashioned directness and realism, and the three observers, taking, as they do, entirely distinct points of view, present together a singularly complete and well-filled picture of the state of the unhappy island. Had the papers been arranged in the order recommended by Professor Morley as the best in which to take them, the effectiveness of the volume would have been yet greater than it is.

"Chronological Outlines of English Literature," by Frederick Ryland, M. A. (Macmillan & Co.), is a book which promises to be useful as a practical help to teachers and writers especially. It is divided into two parts, of which the first, called "General Outline," is intended to bring the annals of English literature into connection with general European literature and history, so that the position occupied by a given work in the line of general development may be ascertained at a glance. From the beginning of the sixteenth century each opening contains six columns. The first gives the dates. The second contains the names of the principal English works published in each year. The third column gives biographical dates of the chief English authors. The fourth is devoted to foreign literature. The fifth contains important historical dates, and events not belonging to English history are pointed in italics. The sixth column contains annotations. The second part of the work contains an alphabetical list of authors with their principal works. It is not to be supposed that this list is exhaustive, or that it is other than selective, and of course objections can and will be taken to the compiler's choice in many cases. An attempt has been made to secure something like exactness in the chronology, though Mr. Ryland has found this exceedingly difficult on account of the inaccuracy of all the bibliographical manuals and the frequent uncertainty as to true dates of publication. In the first part, as the editor comes down to the present time, his selections are apt to appear too restricted and arbitrary. Nothing less than a series of volumes, however, would have enabled him to work on a more extended scale. As far as it goes, the book seems well adapted to its purpose, and for those who are hurried its convenience is obvious.

From the Penn Publishing Company, Philadelphia, we have "The Story of the Iliad" for boys and girls, by Dr. Edward Brooks, A. M., with illustrations from Flaxman's designs. Dr. Brooks has told the story of the siege of Troy in such a simple manner that the boy or girl who cannot grasp his meaning and the interest of the narrative must be unusually dull. He tells it, however, in an abridged form, and to give the young people who get their first glimpse of Achilles's wrath from these pages will have to learn the story over again when they are older. That they may be stimulated to study the "Iliad" in the original Greek is no doubt the hope and purpose of Dr. Brooks.

The Putnams have issued a second edition of Mr. Arthur Collins Maclay's Japanese novel, "Miko Yas-Eiki," which is among the best of the romances written by Western authors upon Japanese history.

From the Bancroft Company, San Francisco, we have received a prettily printed and decorated booklet containing two poems by Julia Clinton Jones, entitled "The Story of the Ship" and "Mechanic Art." The first relates to the building of the Charleston. The second was written for the opening of a Mechanics' Fair in San Francisco. Mrs. Jones writes smooth and flowing verse, and her imagery shows a fertile imagination.
